And so forth; and, third, by competitive examination. He can use either one of the three methods.

Mr. MANSFIELD. He will have that option?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman just said that if an examination is held the man who passes the highest mark on that examination must be appointed?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is under the present Executive order, but not under my bill. You would have one of three options under my bill.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman made the further statement in the beginning of his remarks that this is an honest civil service. I cannot see how it is possible to have an honest civil-service bill with any exceptions. If we are going to do anything, let us do it or not do it at all. Let us pass a bill providing that you must have an examination, and the man who ranks highest in the examination shall be appointed when the term of the present postmaster has expired. Would that not be an honest bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will say to the gentleman from New York if permitting a choice from the first three is not honest civil service, then we have never had honest civil-service examinations, because that is the present law.

Mr. SNELL. I am not defending the basis; but the gentleman says he is going to pass something now that is an honest civil-service bill. You cannot have an honest civil-service bill when the first proviso states that they shall be appointed without competitive examination.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not want to argue that with the gentleman; that is just a question of politics. The gentleman's party—and he knows it—never has, except in one instance, brought any group under civil service by competitive examination; they blanket them in.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In the event the pending bill becomes law, what provision will there be with respect to transfers, so as to make possible transfers from offices in other areas?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That would not be allowable unless they had transferred a year before the appointment was made and lived within the delivery district of the post office for 1 year prior to the appointment.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. After an appointment is made as a result of a competitive examination, can Senators still object?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Absolutely not; they will have nothing to do with it.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. Under the present Executive order the Postmaster General appoints the ranking man, no. 1 man on the list?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. Then if this bill should not be passed, under the present Executive order incumbents of first-, second-, and third-class offices could be reappointed for 4 years.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman's bill provides three methods of appointment. Does the second method have to be exhausted before the third method can be employed?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Postmaster General has to say to the Civil Service Commission that there is nobody in the office who, in his opinion, is qualified for the position.

Mr. HOOK. In other words, if any person now employed is qualified, he must be taken?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not know what the gentleman means by "exhausted." The Postmaster General must affirmatively say that he does not think there is anybody in the office qualified to be postmaster. He does not have to name the individuals by name, but is required only to say to the Commission, "I do not find in the office a man I think is qualified for the position. Hold an examination"; and they would have to hold an examination.

Mr. HOOK. But if there is anybody qualified, no examination will be held?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I say to the gentleman very frankly that, personally, I want to make a career service out of the Postal Service. I believe this bill will do it. The promotion option does not apply to third-class offices, because there are no civil-service employees in such offices.

Mr. HOOK. I may say to the gentleman that in my district, then, there will be Republican postmasters for life.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Suppose the examination were held and three were certified, would it still be the practice to take somebody out of the office who is under civil service and appoint him?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think so; I think they would have to use the eligible list.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one-half minute.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is not a real merit bill, a real civil-service bill, because it does not permit the transfer for promotion to postmaster under civil-service of a person from one section of the country, or one part of a State, to another. This is not a real civil-service bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY].

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill ostensibly breathes a fine spirit of devotion to civil service and on its surface commends itself to many good people, but to my mind it is an unholy alliance of civil service and the spoils system.

It pays tribute to civil service, but it enthrones the spoils system.

I oppose this bill because this is not an honest-to-God civil-service bill, in that it does not provide to each and every citizen of a community a free and equal opportunity to compete in an open competitive examination for the position of postmaster.

On the contrary, if the Postmaster General so desires, each and every citizen of a community will be denied the right to compete in a civil-service examination for the job.

The bill provides that on the expiration of the term of a first-, second-, or third-class postmaster incumbent who, and this is important, has received his position not from civil-service merit, but by pure political appointment, the Postmaster General may at his own discretion reappoint him on a noncompetitive basis. Not only that, but such appointment is an appointment for life.

Partisan argument has no place in a discussion of this matter. On too many occasions constructive thought and action have been thrown to the winds by childlike chidings by Members on either side of the aisle, alluding at length to the historic record of partisanship of the other party.

I wish that such quibbling would not have a place in the consideration of this bill today. It is too serious a matter to play with in such a manner. Referring to the other party with the argument, "So is your old man", will get this Government of ours nowhere. If we guide our attempts for reform and progress by the standard of past records of political abuse, we cannot reform; we cannot progress.

I am in favor of taking the power of political appointment out of the hands of the Postmaster General and out of the hands of our national and local politicians. To accomplish this end we cannot approve this bill before us today.

We cannot approve this bill because it permits the Postmaster General to continue in office the present politically appointed postmasters on a noncompetitive basis.

I urge this House to today take the "noncompetitive" provision out of this bill. What excuse is there for such a provision? Change that to "competitive", and make this a true civil-service bill. It will then have my full and conscientious support.

You will be told today that we must be practical. That you cannot get Congress to vote for a measure which will legislate out of office all postmasters at the expiration of their terms and make them participate in an open competitive examination for reappointment.

This statement is a challenge to Congress.

All down through human history, powerful and selfish interests have sought to gain their objectives under the slogan, "Let us be practical."

What an impetus would accrue to good government if we would make a start in placing principle before practicality or expediency.

And in voting to eliminate noncompetitive examinations under this bill we will be taking steps in this direction. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Civil Service Committee of the House of Representatives, I believe fundamentally in the proposed legislation which is now being considered by this body. In the United States today we have some 46,000 postmasters operating as servants of the American public in the transmission of mail. There are some 13,730 of these postmasters now known as Presidential appointees, leaving some 23,000 coming under what we know as the Classified Civil Service Act and rules.

At the present time the fourth-class postmasters of the United States are under the classified civil service. Those are the postmasters serving in the rural communities of this Republic; men and women who receive money for the work which they perform through cancelations and not by a stipulated salary. They fall in the low group, below $1,100. The other groups, taking in the odd thirteen thousand first-, second-, and third-class offices, operate within a salary radius between $1,100 and $12,000.

Today we are faced with this proposition: The Democratic administration, after 4 years in control of the affairs of our Federal Government, has not only the opportunity but certainly a very definite responsibility to carry into effect in the 4 years of the second administration that which has already been started by this administration in carrying upward, outward, and downward, as the President said in his message at the beginning of the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress, those in the merit system.

Mr. Chairman, it has been intimated here today in the brief debate so far had upon this measure that a man under the civil service will remain there for life. There is no such thing as a position for life in the civil service as it now functions. Any postmaster in the United States may be removed if he fails to function, or does not give to those who come to that office proper service, or if he fails by his actions to bring credit to the United States Government, of which he is a very definite servant. So that, although we would do away with the 4-year term by bringing the first-, second-, and third-class postmasterships under the provisions of the classified civil service, as now exists in the fourth-class offices, we are saying that the term is done away with and a career is started. We are saying more than that. The man who is under the classified civil service, as exists in other branches of the Government service in the number of some 350,000, must give a good account of himself and the office over which he presides. Both the Democratic and Republican parties are committed to the principles of civil service, and today there comes once again, as came in the last session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, the opportunity in the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress for the Democratic administration to lead the way in bringing about the classified civil service provisions to all classes of postmasters in the United States, adding to the 23,000 now in existence the approximate number of 13,730 not now covered.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. I assume that the gentleman frequently receives complaints about the Postal Service in his district, as I do about that Service in mine. The reappointment of the postmaster depends upon his recommendation. When that happens you know what to do about it, but when you appoint these postmasters for life, and you receive complaints from your constituents about the Postal Service in your district, how is the gentleman going to remedy that situation?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say to the distinguished gentleman that when complaints come to him or to me today as a Member of Congress with reference to the failure of a rural carrier or the failure of a postmaster in the performance of his duties under the classified civil service as it now exists, we refer the matter to the Civil Service Commission through the channels of the Post Office Department. An inspector is then sent out to the location where the trouble has occurred. A report is brought back, and if the postmaster or carrier is found wanting he is removed. As I see the situation, the same practice would be continued by extending the civil service to these three groups of offices not now covered.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. In the situation the gentleman states, let us assume, for the sake of argument they did not remove the postmaster and you knew the postmaster had not done his duty. You could under the present system get rid of him at the end of 4 years, whereas under this bill you would be stuck with him. Now you can get rid of him at the expiration of his term if the gentleman felt and the patrons of the office felt the postmaster was not doing his job, but if we pass this law the postmaster would be under the civil service.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say that the patrons of the office would not be stuck with him. The patrons of the office are the ones who are being served.

In conclusion, may I bring to the considered judgment of the membership of the House this statement, which I believe to be a fact, and that is if we are to serve the very best principles of the parties of which we are both a part, because both parties are committed to furtherance of civil service, then today we have the opportunity to function in a very definite manner in enacting this civil-service measure into law for all classes of postmasters in this Republic. We should act courageously. [Applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal of sympathy with the intended objectives of this bill. I think its author, the chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service, is very sincere, but due to political considerations he finds himself unable to bring in a bill which will in actuality extend the merit system to postmasters of the first, second, and third classes. Perhaps this is a step in the right direction, but I doubt it. I believe the intention and purpose is all right, but its effect will be exactly the opposite.

The most ardent advocate of the philosophy that to the victor belongs the spoils is usually sportsman enough to give the same right to the opposition when it wins, but this bill seeks to perpetuate the spoils system for one group, regardless of possible changes in administrations thereafter. It is certainly not a very sporting proposition.

We do not object to perpetuating postmasters in office. We do not object to office without term, but we do strenuously object to giving office without term or forevermore during the life of these postmasters who were appointed for purely political considerations and without any regard to qualifications necessary for service within the postal system.

So we shall offer amendments which will make of this bill a genuine merit-system bill and will create a career service within the Post Office Department. If you are so anxious to extend the civil-service principle, why do you not take in a bureau like the Internal Revenue, which is of the greatest importance and has a personnel of trained experts of extensive experience. These people are of a high caliber and should be protected against removal by political pressure for carrying out their duties without fear or favor in collecting on disputed tax cases. This threat constantly hangs over their heads. If there was ever a group that should be protected by civil service, and where the public should be protected by having trained and competent career men assured in the service, it is the Internal Revenue Bureau. I hope the majority will bring in genuine civil-service bills to put the entire permanent structure of the Government under the merit system.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Do I understand that the Postmaster General, who appoints all these postmasters, can tie them in for life, provided he states they are qualified?

Mr. MAAS. Certainly. They take a noncompetitive examination at the expiration of their present term.

Mr. MILLARD. And they call that civil service?

Mr. MAAS. They call that civil service. It is nothing but freezing in the spoils system of patronage, because you know that some day you who are in the majority now are going to be in the minority, where you have been before, and you want to perpetuate your officeholders in their positions in the hope that you will have a political system which can sabotage any other party that might come into power.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman would not want the man who has had experience to be prevented from having that counted in his behalf?

Mr. MAAS. I certainly would not be willing to give the benefit of such experience to politically appointed postmasters.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Even though they had served in office and had served well?

Mr. MAAS. Only on the basis of open competition with other employees in the Postal Service.

I think the main objections to this bill are, first, it is not an extension of the merit system at all. It is just the opposite, because it permits noncompetitive examinations to politically appointed postmasters, which means nothing whatever. In theory you have competitive examinations for appointments as postmasters now and, generally, the man is selected before he even takes the examination. You know that under the existing sytsem if your candidate is not named one of the first three, you hold another examination and another, and 10 of them, if you have to, until you get him on the list. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, aside from all criticism, this measure is a step in the right direction. Therefore I am for it.

I have asked this one minute to express a thought in which every Member of this House must be interested. Every Member has found himself in a difficult position when he had to recommend the appointment of a postmaster. Invariably disappointment of unsuccessful candidates and their friends left sore spots. My policy has been to go along with the endorsement of the Democratic town committee, which, of course, had to make its selection from one of the candidates certified by the Civil Service Commission. But even then, in most instances, the town committee divided into bitter opposing camps, and the privilege of submitting the recommendation was eclipsed by the discomfort of being subject to threats of political extinction and charges of every nature emanating from the camps of those who were not recommended.

In electing us to the House of Representatives, the people did not intend that a major part of our activities be consumed by postmaster problems. So long as postmasters are patronage, we must devote to them time which should be used in legislative work. By placing the postmasters under civil service, they will be selected on the basis of their ability, and Members of Congress will be spared many an unnecessary headache.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, during the few minutes that I have allotted to me I should like to discuss this question with you and point out some of the matters that I believe should be called to your attention.

In the first place, let me suggest I am in favor of a civil-service merit system. I have always been in favor of such a system. The gentleman who just left the floor stated that this measure is at least a step in the right direction. If it is a step, in my opinion it is a feeble one. It seems to me that while we are about it we should go all the way and have an honest, fair, workable, and practical civil-service merit system.

You have been talking about taking the question of the appointment of postmasters out of politics. Then let us go ahead and do it. Let us not be afraid of the question. Let us go right down the line. There are some points in this bill to which I want to call your attention.

One of them is this: Under this bill you are permitting the present postmaster in office to continue in office without taking an examination of any kind, if the Postmaster General approves it. This, in my opinion, is an important matter. I have no objection, and, in fact, I think it is proper that the present postmasters serve their terms of 4 years from the date on which they were appointed. After that I believe they should be willing to take the examination along with other applicants who are seeking the position.

As a matter of fact, I think a number of the postmasters now holding jobs would be not only willing but would want to do it.

I also want to call your attention to the fact that under the terms of this bill it provides for an examination, and the postmaster is selected from the three persons receiving the highest grades. Why not, if we are going to have a civil-service system, why not appoint the person who gets the highest grade, and not one of three who get the highest grades? If a man gets the highest grade, it seems to me that he should have the job. Let us do this: Let us use our common sense. Let us apply business principles here, just as you would in your own business, and give the man or woman the appointment who is entitled to it by reason of his or her qualifications under a merit system. This is what you say you want to do. Here is a chance to do it. Let us amend this bill and make it workable and practical; make it really worth while, a measure as it ought to be.

Then let us go down the line in other departments of the Government that should be under civil-service system and apply the same kind of a system. I believe that so far as the postmasters in my district are concerned, they would not only be willing but would be glad of such a law. So far as I know, each and every one is a qualified person for the job he holds. He has been appointed for a 4-year term. He should be allowed to finish his term. Then he should take the examination with those who are competing for the job, and if he gets the highest grade, appoint him; and if he does not get the highest grade, then appoint the one who is the best qualified for the position. The man or woman who has been faithful in service is entitled to promotion when there is a chance for it, just the same as you would promote a man or woman who is employed in industry or business. This the merit system would provide.

As I said at the beginning, I want to vote for the civil-service law. I trust that the present measure will be amended so that the question of politics will be taken out of the appointment of postmasters from now on.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting a resolution of the Detroit Federation of Post Office Clerks favoring the enactment of legislation by the United States Congress placing postmasters of the first, second, and third class in the classified civil service.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this proposed legislation.

It is a long step to the realization of the administration's sound program to improve and develop the merit principle of the civil-service system.

Our distinguished chairman, Mr. RAMSPECK, from Georgia, who sponsored this bill, has given it a great deal of study, not only in the present session of the Seventy-fifth Congress but in the Seventy-fourth Congress as well.

It is in line with the administration's program to bring this large group of employees of the Postal Service within the classified lists—a very constructive and progressive contribution to the merit system—and rings the death knell to the vicious spoils system of the past.

It is an act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States through the classification of a little less than 14,000 of the first-, second-, and third-class postmasters throughout the country.

If my memory serves me right, I recall the consideration of this proposed bill in the previous Congress. Under a suspension of the rules of the House the bill came up for consideration, which, of course, required two-thirds of those present to vote in favor of it for its adoption. After a lengthy debate on the merit of the proposal, and the vote was taken, it was defeated because of its failure to receive two-thirds of the vote of those present.

That action, taken by the then Republican minority, in bringing about the defeat of this very meritorious, nonpolitical legislation to improve the civil-service system of our country, can hardly be said to be consistent with the Republican platform pledge of 1924, which specifically provided for exactly the same kind of legislation we have before us today.

We hear now and then a loud articulate complaint from the minority about the "spoils system" and "political expediency" in the distribution of patronage; and yet, near the close of the last session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, when this same kind of bill came up for passage, lo and behold, a majority of the Republicans opposed the measure and it went down to defeat, notwithstanding the fact the Democrats favored the bill by 3 to 1; and when you examine and analyze past records, the Republicans were perfectly consistent, after all, with their party policy by opposing this effort of President Roosevelt to take the postal system out of politics.

If my memory serves me right, the late President Woodrow Wilson, a Democrat, placed all postmasters under the merit system, and the Republican administration which followed the Democratic administration reversed his order; and during the next 12 years of Republican rule that followed the postmasters were in politics as deep as they could go.

When the Republicans saw the handwriting on the wall near the end of the Hoover administration, and knew defeat was to be theirs when the people were to go to the polls, what did the then Postmaster General, the Honorable Walter Brown, do? He rushed off to Omaha, Nebr., where there was a meeting of the National Association of Postmasters. The next morning, September 18, 1931, to be exact, a prominent and nationally known New York newspaper reported his remarks headlined thus:

Postmasters told to enter politics. Brown informs convention that first three classes not barred by law.

As a matter of fact, when the Seventy-fourth Congress adjourned, and the bill had failed of passage, the President, under date of July 20, 1936, issued an Executive order in relation to the appointment of first-, second-, and third-class postmasters which, I might add, superseded all prior Executive orders affecting or relating to the appointment of postmasters to post offices of the first, second, and third classes. This was chronicled as Document No. 7421.

Now, in my humble opinion, this Executive order of the President was a step in the right direction to carry out his strong wishes with respect to the proposal, yet it was not complete, as all appointments required confirmation by the Senate, whereas under the provisions of this proposed bill such confirmation will not be required, and completely takes it out of politics forever, and the Republican Party will have to look for a new "political football" or "political expedient" to play around with.

To the everlasting credit of President Roosevelt, his Executive order placed all postmasters under the civil-service law on July 20, 1936, just about a month after the Republican minority caused the defeat of the Ramspeck bill in Congress. That Executive order of the President's brought about the most effective and sweeping extension of the merit system in a quarter of a century. The Republican opposition to this constructive legislative effort is based on well-founded fears that this juicy patronage reservoir, for 12 long years under control of the Republican administrations, will be eliminated forever if the Ramspeck bill becomes law, and I believe it will be passed today, and then we will hear no more of this constant political sniping at a realistic, conscientious effort of the Democratic administration and its supporters in the Congress to perform a good, practical job and initiate a much-needed reform in our civil-service system.

It is my impression that this bill is approved by a large number of civic organizations, including the Civil Service League. The bill is progressive and constructive, and will, I am certain, tend to improve and build up the morale of the employees of this vast Post Office Department of the United States. [Applause.]

In accordance with the permission granted me I append the following resolution:

A RESOLUTION BY DETROIT FEDERATION OF POST-OFFICE CLERKS FAVORING THE ENACTMENT OF LEGISLATION BY THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS PLACING POSTMASTERS OF THE FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD CLASS IN THE CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE.

Whereas for more than a quarter century the United States Civil Service Commission in annual report, has recommended to the United States Congress the enactment of legislation placing postmasters of the first, second, and third class in the classified civil service; and

Whereas a poll conducted by the American Institute of Public Opinion disclosed an affirmative vote of 86 percent in favor of this highly desirable governmental reform; and

Whereas on July 20, 1936, the President of the United States issued an Executive order providing a transient method of filling vacancies in the office of postmaster; and

Whereas we feel that a legislative short-cut to the establishment of the principle of "civil service" for these positions would be to confirm by statute the Presidential Executive order covering this matter, thereby hastening the day when postmasterships would be opened to the career men and women of the Postal Service, as compared to the time which will elapse if they must wait for political parties to reconcile their views on this question: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By Detroit Federation of Post Office Clerks, in regular meeting assembled, that we do hereby go on record as petitioning the Seventy-fifth Congress to enact into law a statute giving legislative effect to the Presidential Executive order of July 20, 1936: and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be dispatched by air mail to the Michigan delegation in Congress and to the members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives Committee on Civil Service, during Civil Service Week.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, there are very few Members of this present House of Representatives who have served under both Republican and Democratic administrations and who have never made a recommendation to the Post Office Department for the appointment of a postmaster.

I happen to be one who has enjoyed that position. I use the word "enjoy" advisedly because in my judgment there is no real advantage to the individual Member of Congress who is burdened with the responsibility of recommending persons to be appointed as postmasters.

The reason I have not made such recommendation is obviously because I have not been requested to do so.

The political party to which I belonged was at one time in power, but I was not in harmony with its leadership, and now we have a President whose candidacy I supported, but I am not of his political party.

In the one instance, I was in the right party, but supported the wrong candidate, and now we have a President whom I supported, but I belong to the wrong political party.

I do not find fault with those who have made the recommendations, because from time immemorial it has been the custom for the members of the political party in power to make these recommendations.

I do feel, however, that now that the people of this country have finally accepted the progressive viewpoint with reference to the civil service, and in view of the fact that candidates from all political parties were in more or less unanimity of opinion during the last election to the effect that hereafter civil service shall apply to the appointment of postmasters, that we should now write a bill that will not compromise the issue, that we should now enact legislation that will effectively put an end to the bad system that has prevailed in the past; and I believe we should here and now write a real bill that will put the postal department entirely and completely under the civil service. The bill we have before us today, in my judgment, does not meet that requirement. There is still room for too much politics in this bill. I am glad to have the opportunity as a Member of this House to discuss this proposition, and I sincerely hope that when amendments are offered to it to take politics out of the Post Office Department that those amendments will be adopted and we will enact here today a bill providing for a real merit system in the Post Office Department. I shall be glad to support the amendment to be offered by the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] in which she will attempt to take politics out of the postal department. I am glad that finally the Democratic leadership has brought a bill before us. Obviously it would have come with better grace had the proposition been submitted 4 years ago, or even 2 years ago, but, after all, I do not suppose that is of particular concern to any of us, and I feel that those of the political party I represent have more to lose than any other political party, because I am confident that before many years go by those of us who have been in the decided minority in this House will be in a position where we will have an administration that is representative of the progressive movement in this country; but I submit to you that regardless of whether the prospects of progressives controlling the destiny of this country should come to pass or not, I am willing now to cooperate with those who want to make a real honest-to-God merit system prevail in the civil service and in the Post Office Department. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not want anything that I may say construed as being antagonistic to the civil service. I have no complaint to make against the Civil Service or the Post Office Department as to any treatment that I have been accorded by either since I have been representing my district in Congress. The position that I occupy with reference to this bill is that it is my humble judgment and my conviction that it is only a camouflage and is not going to serve the purpose and accomplish the results that the advocates of it proclaim it will. In the very first place, the bill provides that if the present postmaster can pass a noncompetitive examination, he is entitled to a lifetime appointment; and inasmuch as every postmaster did pass the civil-service examination to get his present position, I therefore assume that they can all pass. Then, if you are going to put it on the merit system, may I ask you, if they are going to be appointed for life, why should one man just recently appointed postmaster, whether I appointed him or you in your district appointed him, be given that advantage by reason of his political ties that got him his present appointment? Is there any merit in giving him that advantage over every other good citizen of his community? The answer is, "No!" [Applause.]

This bill also gives incumbent postmasters an advantage over those who have a civil-service status and who have possibly worked for years in trying to merit promotion. A clerk or assistant postmaster in a first- or second-class post office, who has civil-service status, would be barred from appointment, since preference under the bill is given to the present postmaster, notwithstanding he may be a recent political appointee.

I certainly have no quarrel with the postmasters in my district. They are my friends, and of the entire number I only have a complaint pending from the patrons against one, and this complaint is political rather than regarding his conduct in office.

Mr. Chairman, I am ready to support a genuine civil-service bill, one that is free from camouflage and pretext, but, as indicated and admitted by the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, we can pass this present bill, and when a competitive examination is called for a postmastership the Civil Service, under this bill, will certify the three making the highest grades to the Postmaster General, who then is privileged to select one of the three so certified as eligible. The question then arises, How will the Postmaster General go about determining his choice? Will he consult the Member of Congress in whose district the appointment is to be made, or is it the purpose of this measure that instead he may consult others and ignore recommendations from Members of Congress?

Under these conditions, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the Postmaster General might in one instance recognize and follow the recommendation of a Member of the House and in the next disregard it. If this practice should be pursued—and this bill not only permits it but sanctions it—Members of Congress will find themselves in a situation where they will receive the blame for everything that goes amiss in the administration of the law and in the making of postmaster appointments, whereas they can never be certain whether they really have any authority or responsibility in connection with it.

In other words, there will be divided and uncertain responsibility with reference to post-office appointments, and we will not be able to convince our constituents that we have no authority in connection with the appointment of the postmaster in their community, and neither can we tell them we do have the authority and be certain we are telling the truth, because under this bill we will have it if the Postmaster General cares to ask us, and if he chooses not to, we would not have a thing to do with it, and we will then be blamed for any action the Postmaster General takes, even though he so acts without our recommendation.

In other words, this bill creates more confusion and does not clarify the situation that exists today, but leaves it more speculative and uncertain.

If the Civil Service Committee and the leaders of the Democratic Party will bring in here a bill that will wholly remove politics from the appointment of postmasters, I shall gladly support it, but as long as politics is going to have some influence in their selection, then I choose to accept full responsibility for any appointments made in my district.

This is not a civil-service bill, and it does not do and will not obtain the results its sponsors claim for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am in an awkward position here today. I am not against this bill for any of the reasons given by its opponents, nor am I for it for any of the reasons given by its proponents. I consider it a step in the wrong direction.

The only direct contact the people have today with the Federal Government is through the postmasters of their respective communities. And now a bill is presented under which postmasters in the future would be selected from those gentlemen who can accurately state on an examination paper the number of feet it is to heaven or the number of feet it is to hell.

A man may be the most respected and successful citizen in a community, and he may be thoroughly conversant with the needs and wants of that community, and yet be barred from serving as its postmaster because he cannot turn in a perfectly composed examination paper. It would be as foolish to select postmasters in great business centers by civil service as it would be for the President to select his Cabinet officers in that manner.

I want the postmasters left just where they are today, to be selected from the community as they have been for all time. I wish to remind my good friends who have been saying such beautiful things in support of this bill and the civil service and its sponsors of the past that all was not as rosy as they would have you believe. George Pendleton, a Democratic Senator from Ohio, was really the father of the civil service. When he went back to his State after sponsoring that legislation he was denied renomination by his party.

A little later Stephen Grover Cleveland came along. He removed from office the Federal district attorney of my district, M. E. Benton, who afterward served in this body, charging him with "pernicious activity in politics."

A previous speaker here today queried whether the membership of this House possessed intestinal fortitude enough to stand by what is right. That caused me to recall a man of an earlier day who had that quality in abundance. I refer to George Graham Vest, a great United States Senator from Missouri.

Mr. Vest called upon President Cleveland after Mr. Benton's removal from office and asked for an explanation of this drastic action. Cleveland said:

> Yes; I did remove him. He made a Democratic speech, and I consider that pernicious activity in politics.

Then Senator Vest said:

> Mr. President, if he is not reinstated instanter there will be the damndest lot of pernicious activity in politics when the Senate meets that this country ever heard of.

[Laughter and applause.]

M. E. Benton was reinstated.

Civil service in those days was carried to an extreme that smacks of the bill now under consideration.

I have been intimately acquainted with every postmaster, both Republicans and Democrats, in my community for the past 50 years, and there was only one in that time who did not give proper service and consideration to the humblest citizen. One President appointed what was known as a "career man", a man from the ranks, as postmaster in our city, and he was the most arrogant, offensive, and unpopular man who ever held public office. [Laughter.] And he was the only one of that type in 50 years.

Too much weight is being placed on this career business. What we want in public office is more common sense. The position I take in no way conflicts with civil service as it exists today. We want our postmasters of the future, as they have been in the past, to be selected from the business world of the community they represent. The worst thing that could happen to the hundreds of thousands of civil-service employees in the Postal Service would be to have a canned career man placed over them as their superior. They, as well as the citizens, want for postmaster a man or a woman who is truly representative of both their community and the Federal Government. They do not want a career man. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY].

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, today we are taking a great step toward the goal of efficiency and economy in government. Efficiency and economy are the two chief interests of the average citizen and taxpayer in this country. The average man on the street wants the best government and the best governmental services which can be provided at the least possible cost.

One of the greatest services which this Government renders is that provided by the Post Office Department. The Postal Service affects practically every man, woman, and child in this country. These things being true, efficiency in the Postal Service is a goal worth striving for and one which we will realize in this body today.

Since the first civil-service law was passed under President Arthur in 1883 there have been many extensions of the application of civil service and the merit system. President Theodore Roosevelt placed part of the fourth-class postmasters under civil service, and President Taft completed that work as it applies to the fourth-class postmasters. Postmasters of the first, second, and third classes have not fared so well on the extension of civil service. President Wilson brought them within the civil service by Executive order, but his successor, President Harding, promptly dumped them back into the spoils grab bag.

At the beginning of the last session of Congress I introduced a bill to place first-, second-, and third-class postmasters under civil service. Hearings were held on my bill, along with other bills which had been introduced at the same time and for the same purpose. The final outcome was the reporting out of this present bill we are discussing, introduced by the distinguished chairman of the Civil Service Committee [Mr. RAMSPECK]. When that action was taken, I threw my entire support behind our distinguished chairman's bill, and it is this measure upon which we shall take favorable action today.

This is supposedly a land of opportunity, where from humble beginnings one may work his way to the top by virtue of ability, hard work, and contributions to the business in which he is engaged. Under the Ramspeck bill those entering the Service have the incentive of being able to advance to the highest-paid positions. The bill tears down the existing barrier which divides those who can and cannot be at the top just as clearly as the caste system in India divides the elect from the untouchables. Competitive examinations open the gateway to opportunity and service.

It is with these thoughts in mind that I say, "Pass this bill and widen the highroad of opportunity for the employees and increase the efficiency of governmental service to the American people." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of the members of the Committee this afternoon to the fact that in considering this legislation we should consider the fact that it not only pertains to "freezing" postmasters in office but also the fact that we are adding one more chain to our system of bureaucracy. You are promoting the growth of that Frankenstein of bureaucracy that will eventually strangle representative government in this Nation. Whenever you add a great block of employees to this merit system you are assisting in forming a block that will soon result in being the strongest political block ever known in this Nation and will one day not far distant dictate the legislative policies of this Nation.

As I conceive the United States of America, it is a government wherein the government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. Under a system of bureaucracy that is impossible. The people lose control when their Government gets into the hands of those who hold their positions for life.

The principles behind this measure may sound idealistic, but this Government was not conceived upon a policy wherein the principles of government were to be dictated by any block or blocks within this Nation. Eventually we are going to hand over all of the power of this Government to bureaus. As surely as we place all postmasters under civil service, just as surely are we building up this bureau, and just so much more power will we give them to enable them to dictate to us the policies of government.

There is no man within the range of my voice but who knows that every time he goes down town to one of these bureaus he is regarded with contempt. There is not a Member of this House but who knows deep down in his heart that bureaucracy is overwhelming representative government; that bureaucracy has rendered him helpless to fulfill the purposes for which he was sent here by his constituents. There is nothing to be ashamed of in politics. This is the greatest nation in the world, and it was made so by politics. Our system of government is a political system.

Therefore I ask you to defeat this bill. I ask you to strike a blow at this system of bureaucracy which, as I have said before, will eventually overwhelm representative government in this Nation if it is not checked.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in behalf of this measure for just one general reason: That is, because I am interested in the rank and file of workers in the Postal Service of this country, who, I believe, are as fine a group of people in public service as I know. I feel it is a step in the right direction to give those men a chance to hope for regular promotion in the future.

I am not interested in it from a political standpoint myself. There are about 30 post offices in my district, and since this is my first term I obviously have had nothing to do with the appointment of any of the postmasters. But every time we are faced with taking the first step in the direction of certain reforms of this character the cry is always raised, "Now is not the time!"

I believe we have to take that step. I believe myself there could be certain improvements in the legislation. I believe the plan will have to be improved as time goes on; but, in general, I think the big issue is here now and has a lot to do with the promotion of the President's plan of reorganization of the Government, in which I am sincerely interested, and which I hope we are going to be able to carry through.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have been greatly interested in one phase of the discussion here today; in fact, I have been deeply interested in all of it, but there is one phase which has not been touched upon with emphasis, although I believe the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] mentioned it, and that is the affording of a career opportunity for men in the Postal Service.

My colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], chairman of the Post Office Committee, led us to believe that this bill would do it. The gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS], who has just spoken, gives that as one of his principal reasons for supporting this bill. I think it can be demonstrated that this bill means utter stagnation in the matter of promotion for the overwhelming majority of the Postal Service. If you will look at the second section, you will find that no person will be eligible for appointment as a postmaster of the first, second, or third class unless he or she has resided for 1 year within the delivery area of the post office to which he or she is to be appointed.

Now, let us consider this in connection with the provision of the first section to the effect that an incumbent, after taking a noncompetitive examination and meeting the standards, we will say, fixed by the Postmaster General, is to be appointed for life. All right; let us go to a third-class post office anywhere. The incumbent takes the noncompetitive examination and is appointed for life. The assistant postmaster under him cannot get any promotion until the other man dies; he is absolutely stagnated where he is. To become a third-class postmaster he would have to resign his job as assistant postmaster and go to live in another delivery district for a year; and, of course, he cannot afford to do it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. And the present assistant postmaster cannot, under the terms of this bill, do it, for the present incumbent will have a permanent life appointment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly. Let me proceed. If I am mistaken, I shall be glad to be corrected. He has no chance, of course, in the beginning of this game. I am trying to demonstrate that he will never have any chance until the other man dies, and that may be 40 years.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. And the man who is present postmaster precludes him from having a chance, under the terms of this bill, from getting into that position by reason of politics, does he not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but that is incidental.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My time is so limited I regret I cannot.

Let us now take the case of the third-class postmaster who is appointed under the terms of this bill. Talk about a career. How can he ever become a second-class postmaster, one step up the line? To do so he would have to resign his third-class postmastership, move into another district, live there a year, and then try to get in. He will not do it, of course. Take the second-class postmaster; how is he ever going to become a first-class postmaster? He cannot unless he resigns his second-class postmastership, moves to another area, waits a year, and then tries through this bill.

To say that this bill in any important degree opens the door to the laborer in the Postal Service to go to the top of the list is utter nonsense. It stagnates all promotion so long as the system starts with appointment for life of the present incumbent. There the barrier is erected, an insuperable barrier.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I wish the gentleman would tell us what he thinks would be the case if we appointed the new postmaster without term.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but these other men would have a chance.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No more so than now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They cannot compete under this life term with the incumbents; they are stopped before they begin.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of directing a question or two to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Civil Service. My only trouble during the last campaign in my district was with certain disappointed seekers for the office of postmaster. I should like to relieve myself of all responsibility to make the selection, or aid in the selection, of postmasters if legislatively possible.

The pending bill, if I understand it correctly, provides that first-, second-, and third-class postmasters shall hereafter be appointed without term by the Postmaster General. If we follow the previous system, is it not a fact that the Postmaster General will interview the Congressman of the district in which the post office is situated for the purpose of getting his recommendation on whether or not the incumbent continues for life?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I cannot, of course, speak for the Postmaster General. All I can say about it is that he could do it or he could refuse to do it, just as he can do it now or refuse to do it under the present law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the people of a Member's district will hold the Member of Congress responsible for the selection of first-, second-, or third-class postmasters, irrespective of whether the Postmaster General is by law directed to assume such responsibility. And, if this be true, the Member takes on a life responsibility for the appointment of all the postmasters in his district, which will be carried with the Member throughout his career. Instead of lessening the political burden, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the bill may increase the political responsibility of every Member of Congress. [Applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, we have a civil-service rule for the appointment of postmasters now, and that rule is the same as the one applicable to any of the executive departments. In the choice of a stenographer or other civil-service employee by a department, an eligible list is submitted from which the appointment is made. Under an Executive order issued last July that civil-service rule has been changed and the highest eligible will become postmaster, if I read aright that regulation. I dare say the chairman of this committee will tell you that this bill changes that regulation and gives to the Post Office Department three eligibles, as has been the custom in the past.

I dare say he will say that is the case by virtue of an act passed back in 1883; but let me remind the gentleman that the act of 1883 does not so provide.

The authority to submit to the appointing power three eligibles is in pursuance of an Executive order, and the very fact that the President changed this Executive order last July is sufficient indication to my mind that if this act is passed but one eligible will be submitted to the Postmaster General, and that one eligible will become postmaster.

I dare say that under the civil-service examinations that are held not more than 10 percent of the Members of this Congress would be able to pass the examinations for postmaster, for these examinations are upon subjects long since forgotten. There is no telling what types of postmasters we will have if this amendment is adopted. I know of a post office in my district where the first eligible is a poor little consumptive woman in a sawmill town, where the postmaster ordinarily reports for duty in the winter months before daylight. This woman should not be permitted to be postmaster in this little town.

If this bill is passed, we may have any type of unfit person first on the eligible list.

If you think you are shirking responsibility by the passage of this act, you are going to have another guess coming to you after it has been enacted into law. I have three amendments to offer to this bill. I do not know whether you will be able to catch the phraseology of them when they are read or not, but they have been accurately drawn and, if adopted, will put post-office appointments upon the same basis that they are on now and have been in the past.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, in the closing days of the last Congress this same bill, with possible minor exception, was considered in the House and defeated. I have listened to the debate today. I have read the reports of the committee and I do not find any new material; in fact, this matter has been talked about so long that the subject is threadbare. The country understands what is meant by civil service, and it likewise understands the reason why the Congress has never been able to enact a genuine civil-service law affecting postmasters.

The major political parties in convention assembled year after year declare for economical reorganization of the bureaus and departments of our Government and for civil service, which means efficiency. Yet I am telling you nothing new when I remind you that those good intentions end with the counting of the ballots on election day. It was President Roosevelt who, in the campaign of 1932, said:

> The way we do things and not the way we say things is usually the measure of our sincerity.

Now, let us forget politics and remember, for the moment at least, the admonition of the President. This Ramspeck bill which we are considering is anything but a civil-service measure. Pursued to the last option under the bill, competitive opportunity is given for the selection of postmasters. However, so much discretion is given to the Postmaster General in the selection of postmasters that a competitive merit system does not come into play unless the Postmaster General is dissatisfied with the political appointees holding the positions when the terms of the present occupants expire.

This bill would not be so bad—in fact, it would be a pretty good civil-service bill—if it provided that when the terms of those now holding political appointments as postmasters expire a free and open examination be given. I mean an examination permitting all of those persons in the vicinity of the post office where the vacancy occurs to take the examination who desire to do so and who are properly qualified, and then let the winner receive the appointment. Or, if that is too stringent, let the Postmaster General select a postmaster from the three applicants having the highest standing as determined by the examination.

This House will not permit such a bill to pass. Amendments will be offered to this effect, but that would destroy the purpose of this bill and many incompetent political henchmen who now hold positions as postmasters would be supplanted by efficient employees. So again I say that the purpose of this bill is to freeze in office politically selected postmasters, and in many cases mere ward politicians who would not possibly be selected in the communities where they reside to be the local postmaster.

If this House wants to enact a real civil-service law, shorn of all camouflage and sure of accomplishing the objective, let me call to your attention H. R. 3129, introduced on January 18, 1937, by the gentleman from New York, Mr. BACON. As I understand it, this bill has the approval of the Civil Service Commission. It will do the job. It will eliminate all possibility of political preferment in the selection of all postmasters. I am calling the attention of the House to this bill before the Ramspeck bill is taken up for amendment under the 5-minute rule. The Bacon bill will be offered as a substitute for the Ramspeck bill, and here is an opportunity to show whether or not you are for genuine civil service or Democratic political civil service. Listen to me, you advocates of civil service on the hustings just before election. Again I say that here is an opportunity where "the way we do things and not the way we say things is the measure of our sincerity."

It seems inconceivable that in a matter of this kind the members of this body will follow blindly and vote for this measure when an opportunity will be given to place these positions under a civil service not subject to deceit and insincerity.

The Bacon bill will be offered in a motion to recommit, so that there will be a record of those who want to vote for civil service and those who give the impression they want to vote for civil service. Here is a case where you cannot serve two masters. Here is a clean-cut, straight issue, and in order that there can be no misunderstanding as to just what the Bacon bill is I read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, or of any other classes hereafter established, shall hereafter be appointed, without term, by the Postmaster General in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. 430): Provided, That no recommendation by any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, or political endorsement or recommendation of any kind, shall be received or considered in making any appointment or promotion under this act: Provided further, That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until the end of their terms, but they shall not acquire classified civil-service status at the expiration of such terms of office.

SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall make appointments of postmasters by promotion of persons within the Postal Service possessing such qualifications as may be approved by the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 3. If no persons are able to qualify for appointment by promotion under the provisions of section 2, the Postmaster General shall request the Civil Service Commission to hold an open competitive examination under the provisions of the Civil Service Act and rules. In the event the Postmaster General does not select the first name on the eligible register furnished him by the Civil Service Commission, he shall certify to the Commission his reasons for not so doing, which reasons may be made public.

SEC. 4. That all appointments of acting postmasters at offices of all classes shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service rules governing temporary appointments.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives to make any recommendation of any person for appointment or promotion as postmaster.

When this same matter was before the last Congress I expressed my views on the floor of the House, and I have not changed them. We are not interested today in the faults or shortcomings of past political Postmasters General. Each administration, regardless of political affiliations, has played more or less politics with postmasters, and that is one of the evils we are trying to overcome. I fully realize that if this measure is given the political tinge and if the administration is back of the measure, it will go through with just such amendments as the dominating organization decrees. It is too much to hope that the large majority in the House will yield to a suggestion on the part of the small minority, especially when political patronage is involved. The people, however, understand what this is all about, and I am hopeful that enough independent thinking and acting Democrats will join with those of us who believe in civil service and enact an honest-to-goodness law.

Civil service and efficiency in all branches of the Government—State and Nation—is being demanded by the people at this time. Taxes are almost unbearable. National expenditures are mounting, rather than receding. Our national debt is increasing, rather than diminishing. Some things are sure, and among them is that we must have more tax money or less expenses. Less expense necessitates not only more economy but more efficiency, and civil service, properly administered, spells governmental efficiency. I beseech you to forget for the moment that you are Republicans, Democrats, Progressives, or Farmer-Laborites. Be patriots, forgetting political jobs and, if necessary, political fortunes, because in the end that which is good for all of the people is good for Members of Congress. I am not unmindful of the fact that in many congressional districts the Representative depends upon his postmasters for his political organization. I have served in Congress under both Republican and Democratic administrations. I know what it means to have practically all Republican postmasters in one's congressional district, and I know what it means to have all Democratic postmasters in one's congressional district. With the political weight on one side of the scales and the efficiency weight on the other side of the scales, there is no question about which way the beam tips. The people are demanding genuine civil service, and the Bacon bill is the proper step in the right direction.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this bill is good to the extent that it repeals that part of the Executive order requiring appointment of the man who is the highest on the civil-service list to the position of postmaster. In every other respect it is bad, particularly when it puts men into office for life tenure.

Let us not be fooled by a play on words. They say that this bill does not give a life term to a postmaster because he may be removed for cause. We might as well say that the President of the United States is not elected for 4 years, because he can be removed for cause. There is no difference in that respect. I will take the chance with any Member of this House in recommending some person for the position of postmaster, and I believe he would do a better job than will come about from a civil-service examination, where no choice of selection is left.

Mr. Chairman, many a nitwit, many a man who could not manage a chick sale, can pass a good examination on paper. Lots of men have a good enough academic education who could not run a peanut roaster. I have in my office now business from the Post Office Department involving a certain postmaster who does not seem, according to the report of an inspector, to be possessed of executive ability, in a sufficient degree to properly manage the office; he had no difficulty qualifying.

The much-lauded merit system! Can men who praise it describe what it is? Yea, what is this merit system we hear so much about?

Ask some of the department officials just how this civil-service system works with them. These days we follow some clever propagandist who gives a pretty name to some pet plan and immediately it finds favor.

Think of putting men into office for a lifetime in a democratic government.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of a real civil-service law for postmasters in the first-, second-, and third-class offices. It is for that reason I am opposed to this bill, which, in my opinion, is not a civil-service bill, but merely a blanketing bill to give certain powers, certain opportunities, and certain privileges to postmasters who are now in office. I have no objection to these postmasters serving out their terms. I have never appointed postmasters, so I do not know what their political value is, but those who have had this privilege may regard their service as of some importance in campaign time or otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, I believe if we are going to have the postmasters under the civil service, let the general civil-service laws govern applicants for such positions as it does all other people who seek to enter the public service through civil-service examinations. There are certain features of the civil-service law which will be abrogated and some which will not be put into force and operation if this bill becomes a law. One is—and it is an old provision of the law—that a veteran of the World War, or of any other war, shall have preference when it comes to entering the civil service. That preference possibly is not as great as it ought to be, but at least the veterans do have this preference when it comes to taking a regular civil-service examination. We are depriving all of the veterans, unless they happen to be postmasters at this time, of any participation in a contest to become postmasters in their respective communities. In other words, we are taking this preference away from the veterans of the World War and all other wars and giving it to men who may have positions because of their political associations, because they stand in right with political committees or those having the political appointing power.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a civil-service law that means something, but, on the other hand, I believe this law will prevent a real civil-service law being enacted for years for such postmasters.

I believe, instead of this being a step forward in civil service, it means a continuation of the spoils system and the patronage system indefinitely, or during the lives of those who are now postmasters in the various offices.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to myself.

Mr. Chairman, I have no difficulty in understanding my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] or my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], because they are frank enough to say to you that they do not believe in civil service and, therefore, they are opposed to this bill. I do not quarrel with them about that, because they are just as much entitled to their disbelief in civil service as I am entitled to my belief in that system, but I am utterly unable to understand the position of some of my friends here who say they are in favor of civil service, but that this is not the way to do it.

This is the only way it has ever been done in the history of the country, with the one exception which I mentioned originally, and which was the bringing under civil service of the Prohibition Bureau during the Coolidge administration, and as I said last year, the only reason that was done was because it had become a stench in the nostrils of decent government and they wanted to have a character investigation of those employees. They put them under a competitive examination and found that a lot of them were crooks and criminals who had been appointed by the patronage system to enforce the prohibition law. This is the truth about it.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I cannot yield now.

This is the only way we can get rid of the spoils system with reference to the first-, second-, and third-class postmasters. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has already pointed out the fact that there are more than 25,000 fourth-class postmasters who were brought into the civil service without any examination whatsoever, and this was done by two Republican Presidents, and I praise them for it, because, God knows, if we had had to contend with fourth-class postmasters, in addition to first-, second-, and third-class postmasters, we would all have been defeated long ago [Applause.] This is a political liability, and we are offering what I think is a simple, plain bill to bring these offices within the civil-service law and provide for noncompetitive reappointment of men who have already passed a competitive civil-service examination before obtaining their present positions. This fact cannot be disputed.

Mr. O'MALLEY and Mr. WHITE of Idaho rose.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I must decline to yield now, as I yielded most of my time when I had the floor before.

I now want to talk practical politics with my friends on this side of the aisle. You are faced with a President who is determined to bring these postmasters under civil service. Let us get this straight now. He says we are going to have civil service for them. These are his appointments. You have no authority in the matter unless he gives it to you. You have no right to be consulted by the Postmaster General unless he tells Mr. Farley to consult you. I know this has been the practice, but he stated last July that he would put them under civil service so far as he could and he issued an order requiring that they take the top person on the list. So you have no consultation possibilities under the present Executive order. You have nothing to lose, because it is already gone, except every 4 years you are going to have a contest over these offices in your district and you are going to have people thinking you can do something which you cannot do under the present Executive order.

Let me now answer the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. The gentleman says that I am going to tell you that the "three eligibles" provision is in the law. I am not going to tell you any such thing. This is in the regulations of the Civil Service Commission, approved by the President of the United States. It is on page 25, under "certification." They require that in every vacancy under civil service enough names shall be certified so that the appointing officer shall have at least three to select from in filling any vacancy which he may have before him. This is the regulation and it has been this way ever since we have had a civil-service law. Of course, the President and the Civil Service Commission can change it if they want to, but we have no reason to believe that they will because they have not changed it with reference to any other civil-service appointments.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a further fact, in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi, that physical fitness is also a part of the examination?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Exactly; in the case mentioned by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], when he spoke of the little lady who was suffering from tuberculosis and was not physically fit to fill the job, of course, she would be disqualified because physical fitness is one of the necessary qualifications for the job.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I cannot yield now.

I want to say just one other thing in conclusion. This bill complies with the recommendations of the President of the United States as stated in his message on Government efficiency, recommending the extension of the civil service "upward, outward, and downward", and he wants this bill passed. The President favored the passage of such a bill last year. I personally discussed this bill with the Postmaster General a week ago today and went over its provisions, and he stated it was satisfactory to him. It has been approved by the Civil Service Commission. It has the backing of the American Federation of Labor, as well as the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Business Mail Users, the National League of Women Voters, and of every Federal employees' organization in the United States, and also 85 percent of the people of this country, through the Institute of Public Opinion, have endorsed the extension of civil service in the Federal service.

If you want to quibble about details and find excuses because you are against civil service, I have no quarrel with you; but I believe in civil service. I believe it is the best system we have. It is not perfect and we are going to try to improve it, but I believe we will all be better off if we get rid of this liability so we can attend to our legislative duties on the floor of this House and not have our time taken up with contests over political positions. We make 25 people mad and very often make 1 ingrate when we make one of these appointments. Let us settle the matter now and get rid of it so that these appointments will not come up unless some man dies or is removed for cause. We can then attend to the business which the Constitution intended we should attend to and give our attention to our legislative duties.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman will also add the Republican Party to the list of those in favor of the extension of civil service, because their platform so declares.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; the gentleman is correct. This complies with their party platform adopted at Cleveland. It may differ as to details, but when they were in power they never advocated a bill with competitive examinations for the incumbent, and therefore this bill complies with their declarations.

I hope my friends on this side of the aisle will stick to this proposition. This is the first opportunity you have had to carry out the President's message with respect to more efficient government. He declared in favor of extending the civil service outward, upward, and downward, and this is your opportunity to get rid of one of the most troublesome problems we have and to put the postmasters of the country under civil service.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman does not believe in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Mississippi as to jobs——

Mr. RAMSPECK. Absolutely not. We will have a character investigation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen Members are present, a quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall hereafter be appointed without term, by the Postmaster General, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States", approved January 16, 1883: Provided, That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until their terms of office expire.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "Provided", strike out the words "That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until their terms of office expire" and insert "That postmasters now serving who have satisfactory records shall continue to serve until their 4-year terms of office expire, after which they may be reappointed without terms in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of this act."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "without term" and insert "for the term of 4 years."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, the purpose of this amendment and the two others that will follow this one is to put the appointment of postmasters exactly on the footing with which we have always been acquainted—in other words, an appointment for a term of 4 years after a competitive examination and from a list of three eligibles submitted to the Post Office Department by the Civil Service Commission, or with the right vested in the President to reappoint the incumbent.

Those of you who have copies of the bill please turn to page 2. The first amendment offered is to strike out the words "without term" and insert in lieu thereof "for the term of 4 years."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I decline to yield until after I have finished my remarks. The second amendment is on page 1, line 4, and strikes out the words "without term by the Postmaster General" and inserts in lieu thereof "for a term of 4 years by the President."

When the President makes the appointment there is a confirmation by the Senate of the United States. The object of having the Postmaster General appoint rather than the President is to take away from the Senate the right or duty of confirmation.

The third and last amendment I propose is on page 2, line 15, after the word "postmaster." It strikes out all of the matter down to and including the word "promotion" in line 20 and in lieu thereof inserts the following: "or among the three highest on a list of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission after an open competitive examination is held by the Civil Service Commission."

Mr. MANSFIELD. That will be offered only in the event that the other two amendments are adopted?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; in the event that the other two are adopted.

The object of the amendments is to authorize postmasters to be appointed as they have been for a long number of years; and if these amendments are adopted, that course of procedure will follow. I do not know of any public officer in this country more capable of selecting a postmaster from that eligible list of three—a person suitable to be postmaster—than the Congressman who represents the particular district in which a vacancy exists. I assume that our constituents have elected us to represent them, and that we have not come here for the purpose of shirking responsibility. I assume that when we come here we are supposed to represent the best interests of the people of our respective districts. There is not a more important public officer in any little town in your district or mine than the postmaster, and a Congressman is certainly more able to select a suitable one from an eligible list than some $2,500 clerk in the Civil Service Commission; for, after all, selection will come in that manner. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. I do not think it is necessary to say to this Committee that the adoption of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Mississippi means that there will be no civil-service for postmasters. There are some 350,000 positions under the classified civil service in this country, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] cannot point to any position in the classified civil service that has a definite term of office. That is one of the cardinal principles in the civil service. It is to have the appointment during good behavior and without term. The only thing that the incorporation of his amendments into the bill would do would be to nullify the entire purpose of the legislation.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman not think it is the duty of a Member of Congress to come here and legislate for his constituents and not merely to become a glorified job hunter?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think our job is to legislate. These positions are in the executive branch of the Government, and under our system of government they are supposed to be a part of the executive department and not a part of the legislative department. The first two amendments would nullify that entire part of the bill and the second amendment would take away from the employees in the post office any opportunity of becoming promoted to the position of postmaster, as provided in this bill.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a unanimous consent request?

Mr. NICHOLS. If it is not to be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. NICHOLS. I cannot yield.

Mr. Chairman, I am assuming that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] has had his amendments prepared by some one who knows what they are doing, and I suppose he speaks advisedly when he says that if his amendments are adopted they will put the selection of postmasters right back to where it was before the President's Executive order was signed. For that reason I propose to support the amendment, and in so doing I ask the membership of this House to support it also. Then, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I would like to inquire, what is the matter with the so-called spoils system? Of course it will take it back to the spoils system, but what is wrong with that?

This is the greatest Government under the sun, and in the 150 years of its life we have forged ourselves to the head of the procession of nations of the world under a political form of government of the spoils system if you choose to call it that. It is our system of government and has been for the 150 years of our existence as a nation. Why, then, should we abandon it now? Are we sorry to discover that under it our Government has made such progress? I want this selection of postmasters to go back to the old system. I say, as does the gentleman from Mississippi, that I am better qualified to select a man to be postmaster in any of my towns than any member of the Civil Service Commission. [Applause.] And I am not afraid to take the responsibility either. Are you gentlemen going to admit that you are not possessed of a sufficient amount of intelligence so that you can find a man who is qualified to be postmaster in one of your post offices?

Certainly my distinguished friend the chairman of the committee could not have meant what he said when he said that the postmasters now were more corrupt and inefficient than they would be under the system proposed in this bill. No; he does not mean to lay that blanket charge at the feet of the Members of this body. I think every Member here is capable of selecting a man who can take care of the duties of a post office.

The chairman says that there is no use talking about the spoils system, because it is gone. Oh, no; it has not. And let us not try to fool anyone; that system will never be gone as long as we have our present form of government. This Executive order that they flaunt in your face can be changed by this body today by the adoption of this amendment. Of course, you might say that the President could issue another Executive order. Maybe he could, but he could issue another Executive order over your bill if he could over this, supposing the amendments were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, do I understand this would preclude any further debate on any other amendment to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the purport of the request.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then I object.

Mr. RAMSPECK. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WOLCOTT. There are several amendments to the section which I would like to discuss.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Very well.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this particular question was considered some year and a half ago, and I voted for the bill then brought in by the committee with a hope we would get real civil-service legislation. But with this bill before me today I am trying to decide whether this is a bill to promote the merit system or whether it is a bill to keep some admitted incompetents in office and perpetuate bureaucracy.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] has offered an amendment that I favor. If that amendment were adopted, I could vote for the bill with a clear conscience. His amendment puts back into the bill the power of the people to continue to be a check upon some of these postmaster appointments. As the bill reads now, the Postmaster General will be the sole authority as to which name shall be selected from the names submitted by the Civil Service Commission. If anybody in this House has ever taken a noncompetitive civil-service examination, he knows what a lot of "boloney" that kind of examination is. I have taken some of them. I have seen a man with no education get on the top of the list and a college graduate be eliminated because he did not have the right letters coming in and he did not know the right politicians, not because he did not give the right answers. A noncompetitive examination is a lot of bunkum, and there is not anybody in this House who does not know that is a fact. If the Senate has the right to continue to pass upon who shall be appointed, then the people have some rights and they have some protection that the present bill seeks to deny them.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] puts the appointive power back in the President, and I assume from that that the Senate will have to confirm. That is the first safeguard. If this is a bill to keep in jobs people who are competent, as the committee maintains, why not make the present postmasters take a competitive civil-service examination after they have served? Certainly they have the benefit of 2 or 3 years on the job, and if they cannot pass a competitive examination against outsiders who never worked in the post office, they ought not to be kept in office anyway. I do not care whether they are Democrats or Republicans—if they are afraid of competition they must be incompetent. But under this bill as it is brought in now, without the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, you leave it to the Postmaster General to decide to retain them after they take a noncompetitive examination. I have nothing but high regard for the present incumbent, but it has been traditional that the Postmaster General is the head of the political organization of the party that is in power. What a field for political skullduggery if this bill is not amended.

Let us adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi and make it a real bill providing for a real merit system, instead of a bill to vest power in new government bureaucrats.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'MALLEY) there were ayes 122 and noes 98.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. RAMSPECK and Mr. COLLINS to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 144, noes 110.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment on the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: On page 1, line 4, strike out the words "without term, by the Postmaster General" and insert in lieu thereof "for a term of 4 years by the President." In lines 5, 6, and 7, page 1, strike out the following: "in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States', approved January 16, 1883."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition on the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is merely a clarifying amendment, and is in line with the language of the amendment just adopted, and carries substantially the same words and has the effect of making the terms of postmasters 4 years instead of life.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In other words, if the other amendments should be adopted, this amendment should be adopted?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say to the membership that, of course, if these two amendments are adopted, especially the last one, then you have killed the whole effect of this bill and you go right back to what you have now with the President's Executive order, where you must take the top person on the list, and you have no change in the present arrangement whatsoever.

It is virtually equivalent to killing this bill.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is not the gentleman in error when he says that if these amendments are adopted the selection must be made from no. 1? As a matter of fact, I was under the impression—and I just asked the author of the amendment—that if these amendments were adopted selection would be made from the top three on the eligible list.

Mr. COLLINS. That is right.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No such amendment has yet been offered.

Mr. COLLINS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The third amendment has been read, and is in terms as follows:

Or from the three highest on the list of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission after an open competitive examination held by the Civil Service Commission.

And it will be the next amendment I offer.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Then I was right. I repeat and reiterate that the amendment has not been adopted. Under the law the appointment of postmasters is vested in the President, and will continue to be unless Congress passes some other law stating how these appointments shall be filled.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. This amendment, as I understand it, merely substitutes the President in place of the Postmaster General.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true, that is the first part of the amendment; but the second part strikes out "in accordance with civil-service laws and rules."

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman does not object to the President's having the same say he always has had on postmasterships?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I do. I want them appointed by the Postmaster General without term under the civil-service law.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman does not object to the Senate having the final say, does he?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I do. I want them to have no say whatever about it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Well, the Senate is the people; and the people are not to have any final say as to who is to be postmaster?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I want them to be under civil service, to be under the merit system.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks for a division of the question. The Clerk will report the first part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 4, strike out the words "without term by the Postmaster General" and insert in lieu thereof "for a term of 4 years by the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on that part of the amendment just read by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 127.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. COLLINS and Mr. RAMSPECK.

The Committee again divided; and there were—ayes 152, noes 115.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second portion of the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 5, 6, and 7, of page 1, strike out the following: "In accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States', approved January 16, 1883."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second part of the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSPECK) there were—ayes 120, noes 100.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Appointments to positions of postmaster at first-, second-, and third-class post offices shall be made by the reappointment and classification, noncompetitively, of the incumbent postmaster, or by promotion or transfer from within the Postal Service in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act and Rules, unless the Postmaster General certifies to the United States Civil Service Commission that there is no qualified person serving in the vacancy office available for such promotion or transfer.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of section 2 and insert:

"SEC. 2. Appointments to positions of postmaster at first-, second-, and third-class post offices shall be made by the reappointment and classification, noncompetitively, of the incumbent postmaster, or by promotion from within the Postal Service in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act and Rules, unless the Postmaster General certifies to the United States Civil Service Commission that there is no qualified person serving in the vacancy office available for such promotion. No person shall be eligible for appointment under this section unless such person has actually resided within the delivery of the office to which he is appointed, or within the city or town where the same is situated for 1 year next preceding the date of such appointment, if the appointment is made without competitive examination; or for 1 year preceding the date fixed for the close of receipt of applications for examination, if the appointment is made after competitive examination."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 15, after the word "postmaster", strike out all of the matter down to and including the word "promotion" in line 20, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "or from among the three highest on a list of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission after an open competitive examination held by the Civil Service Commission."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted the incumbent postmaster can be reappointed for a further term of 4 years or an eligible from the civil-service register can be appointed after a new examination has been held by the Civil Service Commission. This is exactly what the amendment does, and all that it does.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman's amendment makes the examination competitive, so that the incumbent, if fit, should be able to pass it, and if not fit, will be succeeded by somebody else.

Mr. COLLINS. The incumbent can be reappointed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Ought not the gentleman's amendment be so modified as to strike out in line 13 the word "shall" and insert the word "may"?

Mr. COLLINS. I submit to the gentleman from Texas that the words "shall' and "may" in this sense mean identically the same.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. In case the present incumbent of the office were over the age limit, he could not get on an eligible list.

Mr. COLLINS. The civil-service rules already apply.

Mr. FLETCHER. But he would not be of eligible age.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I call the Committee's attention to the fact that under this amendment the possibilities of promotion from within the Postal Service are eliminated. It would be true, of course, that any post-office employee could take the competitive examination, but this amendment destroys any possibility of what I understand to be a career service, where men can be promoted up the line and get to be postmaster; they would have to stand a competitive examination.

Mr. COLLINS. The rule would be identically as it is now.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. According to the committee's bill, is it possible for an employee of the Post Office Department to be appointed without taking a civil-service examination?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Absolutely. He can be under the express terms of this bill.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Is that not a great advantage over the outside public who may wish to get a chance at the postmastership?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is because he is under the civil-service system.

Mr. COLLINS. Every clerk in the post office would be on the same footing as everyone else.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I want the Members, especially those on this side who have been pleading for a real civil-service system, to know if they vote for this amendment they are voting out any possibility of a career system in this bill and denying the post-office employee the right to be promoted to the position of postmaster.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Can that situation be remedied by adopting the Bacon bill, which is a real civil-service bill, and will be offered as a part of a motion to recommit?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I doubt if the Members on the gentleman's side will vote for the Bacon bill.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. May I ask the gentleman if under the provisions of the amendment we are considering he will admit it would be possible for any civil-service employee in a post office to compete with anybody else and become postmaster if he can pass the civil-service examination?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I have said that in my previous statement, I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma. I am not trying to cover up anything. I said he could still take the competitive examination.

Mr. NICHOLS. Then how can the gentleman say he is being discriminated against?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I say you are destroying the career system. I am trying to build up a system whereby a man may go in for a career and hope to be promoted on the basis of merit and efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSPECK) there were—ayes 125, noes 95.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH: Page 2, line 20, after the word "promotion", on line 20, page 2, strike out the remainder of the sentence ending with the word "examination", on line 25, and insert the following: "No person shall be eligible for appointment under this section unless such person has actually resided within the State or Territory in which the office to which he is appointed is situated for 1 year next preceding the date of such appointment"; and strike out the remainder of section 2.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, much has been said here this afternoon about opening up a career service for members of the Postal Service. I tried to call the attention of the committee to the language commencing in line 20, page 2, during my remarks earlier in the day and pointed out that the language, which restricts eligibility amongst applicants to those who have resided for 1 year within the delivery area of the post office to which they desire appointment, has the effect of stagnating promotion for all second- and third-class office employees. They cannot move out and establish residence for 1 year in some other district.

My amendment is to enlarge the area in which postal employees, presumably career men, may be eligible for promotion by changing it from the present provision, which reads "delivery area", to the State or Territory in which the office is located. This will greatly simplify the administration of the civil-service regulations. You will not have to carry on the civil-service records thirteen-thousand-odd eligible registers for first-, second-, and third-class postmasters. You will have to have only 48.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman feel that a man living in the southern part of New York should be entitled to be appointed postmaster of a town on the Canadian border?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he lands in the first three in a competitive examination; yes.

This opens a career to these young men. Otherwise there is no career.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to correct what, in my judgment, is a misapprehension. The employees of the third-class offices are not career employees and are not covered by the civil service. They are selected by the postmaster and paid out of a lump-sum appropriation.

This matter of promotion has been discussed for a long time. The most satisfactory service that experience indicates can be had in the Postal Service or in any other service is to open the avenue for promotion in the office where an employee is entirely familiar with all of the activities of that office. In other words, a man who grew up in the service in New York City is better qualified to be postmaster there than someone who worked in a post office four or five hundred miles away from New York City.

Mr. Chairman, just contemplate a case in your own State. Take a man in some distant office, even though that man under this bill now possesses all of the opportunity of advancement from the lowest grade to the postmastership of his own town. Transfer him to the other end of the State and put him over all of the employees in another community. Do you think that system will be as satisfactory as would be the case if conditions are as provided in this bill?

This bill gives opportunity to the employees they have never enjoyed before, and every employees' organization have had a chance to study the bill and have come before the committee and recommended passage of the bill in its original form. I believe the bill as written is more satisfactory.

So why talk about transferring a man from one end of the country to the other or from one end of a State to another or from a small office to a larger office when we all know we are going a long way in the right direction by opening up opportunity for advancement for the men in any given office or locality.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman point out what advantage has been gained for a member of the Postal Service under the bill as now amended?

Mr. MEAD. As now amended?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. MEAD. The bill as now amended will probably result in little gain for anyone, because, in my judgment, the amendments will not be approved by the Commission or by the President.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. We should confine ourselves to the pending amendment. Am I correct when I say that a man in southern New York who is capable of passing an examination and getting a higher grade than a man who may have worked for 15 years in a northern New York post office would get the appointment under the pending amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. And the career man in the northern office would be denied promotion.

Mr. MEAD. Yes; and I maintain that the man in that particular office and in that particular locality is equally as able to handle the affairs of that office.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall probably not use the entire 5 minutes, because I simply want to point out that inasmuch as my distinguished colleague from New York and myself for the moment are exchanging opinions, it is his opinion that the ship has been scuttled and that the bill will get us exactly nothing, while I am of the opinion, lame as it may be, that at this time we have a good bill and a bill that will put the situation back where it should be. If you share this thought, then do not go along with the amendment of my distinguished Republican friend from New York on this side of the aisle who would open the thing up and make it so that a man in northwestern Oklahoma could be appointed to fill a post-office position in southeastern Oklahoma. You have a good bill now. You have fought and adopted it. Vote down this amendment, and let us pass the bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Does not the gentleman believe that if there is not a competent person within the delivery of an office, the office ought to be abolished? [Laughter.]

Mr. NICHOLS. I do, yes; and I may say to my friend from Texas that I am confident that in the community served by every post office there is a competent man who can be appointed postmaster there. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Appointments of acting postmasters in all classes of post offices shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service rules governing temporary appointments.

SEC. 4. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOILEAU: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, or of any other classes hereafter established, shall hereafter be appointed, without term, by the Postmaster General in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. 430): Provided, That no recommendation by any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, or political endorsement or recommendation of any kind, shall be received or considered in making any appointment or promotion under this act: Provided further, That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until the end of their terms, but they shall not acquire classified civil-service status at the expiration of such terms of office.

"SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall make appointments of postmasters by promotion of persons within the Postal Service possessing such qualifications as may be approved by the Civil Service Commission.

"SEC. 3. If no persons are able to qualify for appointment by promotion under the provisions of section 2, the Postmaster General shall request the Civil Service Commission to hold an open competitive examination under the provisions of the Civil Service Act and rules. In the event the Postmaster General does not select the first name on the eligible register furnished him by the Civil Service Commission he shall certify to the Commission his reasons for not so doing, which reasons may be made public.

"SEC. 4. That all appointments of acting postmasters at offices of all classes shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service rules governing temporary appointments.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives to make any recommendation of any person for appointment or promotion as postmaster."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BOILEAU. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman, for that purpose. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, in this debate we have heard a good deal, especially from the Republican side, about the so-called Bacon bill. I made a statement in general debate that I was going to vote for that amendment. I waited for this substitute bill to be offered. I thought it was going to be offered from the Republican side. I now understand it is the intention of the Republicans to defer action on that amendment until it is offered as a motion to recommit.

It seems to me that now is the time to present the matter as to whether or not we shall have a civil-service bill. You all admit that the bill as it stands and as it has been amended does not mean anything.

If you want a real civil-service bill, adopt the Bacon bill, which is incorporated in my amendment. I say to you Republicans, if you want the Bacon bill, the bill your leaders were talking about, now is the time to do it, without waiting for a motion to recommit.

I appreciate the fact that it probably would stand a better chance if it had been offered by some member of the committee. I say to all you Members on the other side of the aisle that if you want a real civil-service bill vote for this amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is the difference between bacon and pork? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOILEAU. The difference is that the Bacon has the real merit system.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not understand the reading of the amendment. Will the gentleman explain the Bacon bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. I have not the time for an extended explanation, but I will give the gentleman this brief explanation: This Bacon bill puts the Postal Department absolutely on the merit system under the civil service. It relieves Members of Congress from making recommendations and puts the Postal Department on a merit system.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman's amendment comply with the bill that the Republican Presidential candidate talked about?

Mr. BOILEAU. And the Democratic Presidential candidate also; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A pro-forma amendment is not in order as long as time remains in opposition to the amendment. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. MICHENER. I am in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has been exhausted in favor of the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 95, noes 125.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. COLLINS and Mr. BOILEAU to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 130, noes 148.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: Page 1, line 3, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall hereafter be appointed without term, by the Postmaster General, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States', approved January 16, 1883, as amended, and the rules prescribed thereunder: Provided, That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until their terms of office expire. In the examinations for such positions experience in the Postal Service shall count for 50 percent; but no credit shall be given for experience in the Postal Service, under an appointment made prior to the enactment of this act, as postmaster or acting postmaster in an office of the first, second, or third class. The applicant receiving the highest rating shall be appointed in each case.

"SEC. 2. Appointments of acting postmaster in all classes of post offices shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service rules governing temporary appointments.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives to make any recommendation of any person for appointment or promotion as postmaster or acting postmaster."

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. As I understood the reading of the amendment by the Clerk, there is not a provision in it that has not been defeated in this House this afternoon. The matter has been already acted upon, and, therefore, is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has looked at the amendment and thinks that in its entirety it is a different proposition from anything that has been before the Committee heretofore, and overrules the point of order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota for 5 minutes.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, if this House wants civil-service reform and wants to extend the merit system to postmasters, this amendment will do that. Let us have either a merit system in the Government, or let us cut out the camouflage and get back to the open spoils system of patronage; let us kill one or the other. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The amendment that I have proposed would create a genuine competitive civil-service merit system in the Postal Department. It is true it has a provision that some of you gentlemen do not like, because it prohibits Senators and Representatives from interfering with the Government personnel by controlling patronage. It prohibits you from endorsing or recommending people for appointment in the civil service, and I have another bill that I intend to introduce this year to make it a felony for any Member of Congress to recommend anybody for a Federal job. [Applause and cheers.] As a matter of fact, the most serious threat to our democratic system of government is permitting the Executive to control the Legislature by dishing out patronage.

When you insist on a patronage system, you are insisting upon the right to sell the people's votes in this House for the personal gain of building up a political organization to perpetuate yourselves in office. You are not interested in perpetuating the merit system. [Applause.] Your interest is in perpetuating yourselves in office, but the people will have something to say about that, also.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. If we can get order, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. I wonder if the gentleman from Minnesota can inform the House as to what party has kept itself in office through tariff preference, exploitation of our natural resources, subsidies, and other devices. [Applause.]

Mr. MAAS. Has not the time come to quit looking backward? Let us look ahead. [Applause.]

I am not defending the undemocratic practices of any administration. I am interested in correcting them and providing now against their continuance in the future by this or any other administration.

The present bill is not an extension of the merit system, but a perpetuation in office of politically appointed party workers.

Perhaps party workers should be rewarded for faithful work on behalf of the party, but not on the public pay roll at the cost of the taxpayers. Government jobs do not belong to the victorious party to be used to pay political machines at public expense. These jobs are created to perform services for all of the citizens.

Most of the job holders affected by this bill were not appointed upon a merit system and therefore to cover them into civil service with noncompetitive examinations is not an extension of the merit system.

A real career system is prevented by the terms of this bill by putting in a residence requirement. Such a requirement is purely political. The postmaster is an administrator and not a route inspector. The requirements of a good postmaster are executive ability, knowledge of postal policies, and the quality of leadership. He does not need to know the exact location of every side street.

Often it is desirable to bring in an outside, trained postmaster, who is not involved in local post-office cliques and internal feuds.

This bill still leaves the door wide open for the spoils system. It permits the Postmaster General to appoint, with or without congressional endorsement, acting postmasters, and then, after a few months, virtually cover them into civil service on a noncompetitive basis as experience in the job counts 80 percent in the examination. This in effect precludes an open competitive test.

It continues a political rather than a strictly merit system, because the Congressman may still make the recommendation on the final appointment, even when it is on a so-called competitive basis. This will place a premium on political activities of postal employees who hope to become postmasters. The effect will be to stimulate politics among postal employees rather than abolishing it.

A genuine merit system will improve the service, for a career system where one may enter at the bottom and look forward to the opportunity to go to the very top will attract and hold even more desirable young applicants.

In normal business times many of the most capable employees resign, because they realize that they are in a blind alley. Open the doors to the top, and the bottom will take care of itself.

I urge the adoption of my amendment, which will make this bill provide a real merit system on a fair, open, competitive basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to make a motion to close debate?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, civil-service reform for the Nation was born in my State. The movement for it was headed for many years by Richard Henry Dana, a resident of my district, and my constituents are probably more interested in this matter than those of any other district in the country.

I should feel that I betrayed my trust if I did not rise here and ask in their behalf, in behalf of all those interested in civil-service reform throughout the country, in behalf of all who desire better government, in behalf of the League of Women Voters, that you cast your vote on the motion to recommit in favor of those who desire real progress in this reform.

This will be one of the few vital votes for the interests of every Member that will be cast in this session. This vote will be noticed in every corner of the United States by earnest women who have come to the conclusion that no more important reform faces the American people than this now before you.

I urge you to bear in mind not only your own welfare in future elections, but, far more than that, exceeding it to a degree that can hardly be magnified, I urge you to look out for the interests of your country, the interests of a nation that is now threatened by the growth of its public service to such an extent that it will collapse unless this service is organized on an efficient scale.

Civil-service reform has been threatened by what has gone on this afternoon. Before my time expires let me explain to you that the motion to recommit will be for the pure and complete civil-service reform that is desired by the League of Women Voters and all those others concerned whom I have already mentioned.

I bespeak for your welfare and that of the country—and I emphasize "that of the country", mind you—I bespeak the views of that half of the people who have greatest concern with the future of our country, who have so earnestly been praying an opportunity to share in its destinies, who by their votes stand for ideals, stand for integrity, stand for bettering the government of country, and so bettering humanity. I appeal for your votes, because in that way you will continue the march upward begun 73 years ago by a great Senator from my State, Charles Sumner, who introduced the first bill for national reform.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mrs. O'DAY. May I ask when the League of Women Voters endorsed the bill offered by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LUCE. I cannot inform the lady.

Mrs. O'DAY. I am vice chairman of our local League of Women Voters, and I have had no correspondence on that subject at all. I know they are all for civil-service reform, and, as far as I know, they are for the committee's bill. I have heard nothing to the contrary.

Mr. LUCE. May I say that the committee bill as such no longer exists? [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has expired.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committtee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 1531, and pursuant to House Resolution 89 he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on all of the Collins amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report all the Collins amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "without term by the Postmaster General" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "for a term of 4 years by the President."

Lines 5, 6, and 7, page 1, strike out the following: "in accordance with provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States', approved January 16, 1883."

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "without term" and insert in lieu thereof "for a term of 4 years."

Page 2, line 15, after the word "postmaster", strike out all the matter down to and including the word "promotion", in line 20, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "or from among the three highest on a list of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission after an open competitive examination held by the Civil Service Commission."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Are we voting on the three amendments en bloc or separately?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman request a separation of the vote?

Mr. MAPES. No.

The SPEAKER. Without that demand, the vote will be en bloc upon all the Collins amendments.

The question was taken; and the Chair was in doubt.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 216, not voting 52, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the remaining amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] opposed to the bill?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Civil Service with instructions to that committee to report it back forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, or of any other classes hereafter established, shall hereafter be appointed, without term, by the Postmaster General in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. 430): Provided, That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until the end of their terms, but they shall not acquire classified civil-service status at the expiration of such terms of office.

"SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall make appointments of postmasters by promotion of persons within the Postal Service possessing such qualifications as may be approved by the Civil Service Commission.

"SEC. 3. If no persons are able to qualify for appointment by promotion under the provisions of section 2, the Postmaster General shall request the Civil Service Commission to hold an open competitive examination under the provisions of the Civil Service Act and rules. In the event the Postmaster General does not select the first name on the eligible register furnished him by the Civil Service Commission, he shall certify to the Commission his reasons for not so doing, which reasons may be made public.

"SEC. 4. That all appointments of acting postmasters at offices of all classes shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service rules governing temporary appointments."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCE. Is the pending motion substantially the same as H. R. 3129, known as the Bacon bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not in position to answer that inquiry.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that a vote against the motion to recommit will be a vote in favor of the Ramspeck measure?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not in position to answer the gentleman's question.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 269, not voting 54, as follows:

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WARREN (at the request of Mr. CLARK of North Carolina), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. PETERSON of Georgia, for an indefinite period on account of illness.

To Mr. GREENWOOD (at the request of Mr. GRISWOLD), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. GILDEA (at the request of Mr. BOLAND), for balance of week, on account of illness at home.

To Mr. ENGEL (at the request of Mr. MAPES), indefinitely, on account of death in family.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in common with the citizenry of the entire country all of us are profoundly touched by the epochal flood disaster that has fallen on our Midwestern States. All of us are watching with loving solicitude and the deepest sorrow the heart-rending developments in the flood-stricken areas. We visualize a great section of our beloved country covered with a pall of grief and anxiety, accompanied by tragic suffering. We see a region where only a short time ago happiness and contentment reigned suddenly changed to a picture of utter desolation. Many of our fellow citizens have been driven from their homes; many are cold and hungry; many are wandering in sheer desperation, not knowing where to turn or what to do. Our hearts are troubled beyond expression by this unprecedented catastrophe. We regret our impotence to relieve in any appreciable degree the myriad forms of suffering caused by this major disaster, but we want our fellow beings in the flooded areas to know how deeply concerned we are over the terrible fate that has befallen them. We want them to know that they will be on our minds and hearts and remembered in our prayers every minute, day and night, until their cup of suffering, now so full and overflowing, shall pass away.

Reflecting, as I believe I do, the Nation's love and devotion to the sufferers in all the sister States in these tragic times, I have introduced today a bill granting a total exemption from income tax of all donations for relief of sufferers from this superflood. Under existing legislation individuals are entitled to exemption from tax on donations for charitable purposes up to 15 percent and corporations up to 5 percent of their incomes. My bill would add the provision that all who desire to donate to relieve the sufferers from the present flood may do so knowing that the Government will give them an income-tax exemption for the total amount they contribute for this worthy purpose. The righteous principle of granting such exemptions was recognized by Congress in the Revenue Act of August 30, 1935, when the privilege of tax exemption for charitable purposes was extended to corporations. Prior to that it had been confined to individuals.

To those who might be inclined to object to this legislation on the ground that it might set an embarrassing precedent, let me say that as far as we know not since the days of Noah has there been a flood comparable in damage and destructive implications with the flood now raging in the Midwestern States.

An enormous amount of money will be required to combat the effects of this flood. I believe this proposal would stimulate contributions that will be sorely needed. I believe the Government could well afford to lose this slight revenue in exchange for the immensely greater benefit that would come to these stricken people. I believe the bill is a righteous measure in the interest of suffering humanity, and I would like to see it pass unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if there is any one principle or policy of government more unequivocally declared against, disapproved, and denied than any other under our system of free self-government it is the principle of life tenure.

The effect of life tenure in office would be to create an exclusive office-holding class, separate and apart from the people, the void between whom and the people widens and broadens as time goes on, carrying self-government and free institutions back to the indifference of autocratic rule, against which our forefathers fought at the cost of blood and treasure.

And if there is any one office, whether Federal, State, or local, which should be kept in close touch with the people and made more responsive to them than another, it is the community post office.

There are certain public officials exercising discretionary policy of administration who should always remain a part of the people, should always remain of the people, should always remain by the people, to be and remain for the people.

The principles and policies of free self-government instituted to safeguard liberty and civil rights are as sacred to be observed on earth as the principles and precepts for salvation and for the repose and peace of the soul in heaven and the life to come.

The religious devotions and obligations of men who assume to serve their Maker are not more vital or sacred to be observed than the obligations to be adhered to by public officials assuming to serve the people; and I quote from the Holy Scriptures to show the rule declared for one is as applicable to the other.

St. John, chapter 3, verse 3:

Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

Again, from the same chapter, verse 5:

Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God.

And, further, from this chapter, verse 7:

Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again.

Public officials under free self-government must come back and down to the people at certain stated intervals of time to account to the people, to be commissioned by the people anew, and to be born again of the people.

There is no other public official who comes so near and close to the people, to every man, woman, and child in their everyday affairs of life and whose course and conduct toward them more clearly concerns their happiness and welfare than the postmaster of the community.

And there is the same or more reason for the election of postmasters by the direct vote of the people as for the election of State and local officials. There is no other public official who should be held nearer to the people and made more approachable to them.

There is no other public office where life tenure is more inapplicable, where it is more incompatible with the service, or more in violation of free institutions than the office of the community postmaster.

Under the law of selfish human nature, men always act first for themselves before they act for others.

Many ingenious inventions and devices in the form of bonds, oaths, and penalties have been imposed in vain upon men to modify and overcome the selfish impulse and to make them act first for others, whom they assume to represent, as they would act for themselves.

But all these are ignored and disregarded, as love laughs at locksmiths, and a return to the people at certain stated intervals to account to and be recommissioned, to be born again of the people, remains the only restraint upon men to make them serve and act first for others.

Under the law of selfish human nature it has always been the great problem of free self-government, the great problem of all governments, to create obligations upon officials higher than those of selfish nature to make them first devote their services to the people.

There is no royal road under free institutions whereby to restrain and overcome and subordinate selfish human nature and insure good faith, obedient service.

Public officials must act and serve by and with the consent of the people, with direct responsibility to the people, and subject to the will and wish and their approval or disapproval.

Public officials must be directly responsible to the people or indirectly responsible to the people through other officials directly responsible to them, and who must answer to the people and assume such responsibility for them.

With the responsibility to account only to the Civil Service Commission, a far-away body or organization operating under cold, technical rules, and beyond the patrons' power to reach except through technical forms and regulations, the confiding post-office patrons are powerless to exert their will and wish either directly through their own vote or through their Member of Congress who has assumed responsibility for them.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke today on the postmasters bill may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the postmasters' bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art from everlasting to everlasting; whose eternity, in which we share, gives meaning to our lives, help us so to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Inspire us with a zeal for truth, for freedom, and for every noble virtue, that our souls may be as pure as the naked heavens as we travel on Life's common way in cheerful godliness; and may we lead men by the light of our countenance, as we lay upon our heart the lowliest of their burdens and their sorrows.

Be Thou with all Thy children in the valley of the shadow, that they may fear no evil; and at eventide may there be light and the bridge of golden sunset leading into the eternal day. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas it is indicated that there is a determination of certain Government officials to secure a ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention; and

Whereas any attempt to raise the embargo on animal products from Argentina, or any Province thereof, would subject the livestock and wild animal life of the United States to a constant menace of foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas past experience shows that outbreaks caused by such importations have caused millions of dollars' damage and consequent depletion of livestock and game, and have been a source of great economic loss: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Thirty-first General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the house of representatives concurring herein), That we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to protest the ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention and urge the members thereof to work for the continuance of the present embargo against every country where the disease is known to exist and that there shall be no experimentation at the expense of the health and safety of our livestock and wild animal life; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress of the United States, and to each Member thereof from this State, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to each house of legislative assembly of those States whose legislatures are now in session.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Senate Joint Memorial 1

To the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in regular session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition your honorable body as follows:

Whereas an Executive order issued through the Works Progress Administration has forced several hundred women with dependent children in the State of Washington to stop work on W. P. A. projects and has forced them to depend entirely on money from the fund for aid to dependent children; and

Whereas such aid is only $18 for one child and $6 for each additional child under 16 years of age, which is manifestly inadequate for the proper maintenance of a family; and

Whereas this order has not only seriously affected the immediate material welfare of these mothers and their children, so that they are now in desperate circumstances, but has also forced many of them to leave educational classes which they were attending in order to prepare themselves for permanent positions in commercial and industrial fields;

Therefore your memorialists do most earnestly pray that this Executive order be rescinded and these mothers returned to the projects where they were working.

Mr. CLARK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 4

Whereas the Social Security Act, enacted by the Congress of the United States, assessed a tax on employers of eight or more, commencing January 1, 1936, and the tax for the calendar year ending December 31, 1936, for Missouri is estimated to exceed $5,000,000; and

Whereas under the terms of said Social Security Act, enacted by the United States Congress, it is provided that said funds shall become a part of the general revenue of the United States unless the State of Missouri shall have enacted an unemployment compensation law prior to December 31, 1936; and

Whereas there was no session of the General Assembly of Missouri subsequent to the enactment and approval of said Social Security Act and prior to January 1, 1937, and the general assembly is now in session and is considering the enactment of such law; and

Whereas the State of Missouri will lose the benefit of said taxes collected for the year of 1936 unless Congress shall extend the time for the enactment of legislation under the act: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri by this concurrent resolution memorialize and request the Senators from Missouri in the United States Senate and the Representatives in Congress from Missouri to use their influence and assistance in obtaining an extension of time which would permit the General Assembly of Missouri to enact an unemployment compensation law which will be applicable to taxes collected for the year of 1936, and that Congress authorize the Federal Government to give the credits on said taxes provided for in the Social Security Act provided that the State of Missouri shall enact an unemployment compensation law during the present session of the fifty-ninth general assembly.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted by the Citizens' Progressive League, Cambridge, Mass., favoring the enactment of antilynching legislation, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the mayor of Lockport, N. Y., praying for the taking of immediate steps to end the present strikes in the automotive and allied industries, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of East Aurora and vicinity, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of neutrality legislation laying mandatory embargoes, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of New York City and vicinity, praying for the enactment of legislation creating a Federal music project as a permanent establishment to be subsidized with a living wage for musicians, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COPELAND. I present a letter in the nature of a petition from the Dairymen's League of my State for appropriate reference. I ask that the brief resolution attached thereto may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas most boards of health in New York State require that milk be offered for sale from only such dairies as are reasonably free from mastitis; and

Whereas this program is beneficial to public health; and

Whereas at present there are neither Federal nor State indemnities paid dairymen for cows rejected for mastitis; and

Whereas this program in many instances creates a tremendous financial loss and burden upon the dairy farmer.

Now, therefore, we the officers, delegates, and members of the Oneida-Herkimer Counties Dairymen's League organization assembled at the courthouse, Utica, N. Y., on January 25, 1937, do hereby go on record as requesting that the matter of suitable State and Federal indemnities for cows rejected for mastitis be given consideration, and a copy of this resolution be sent to the proper State and Federal lawmaking representatives.

PROGRAM OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a copy of the policies of the American Farm Bureau Federation as outlined in a conference with the President at a meeting of the executive committee with him on January 12, 1937.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The executive committee of the American Farm Bureau Federation, pursuant to and in accordance with the direction of the voting delegates at the recent annual convention, herewith presents to the President and to the Congress an outline for legislative action during the present session for a permanent program along production lines for agriculture, so that prices for agricultural products will be maintained on parity levels of prices of industry and labor.

To accomplish this objective existing provisions of law should be strengthened or new legislation enacted to maintain or set up the following programs:

1. For the purpose of guaranteeing to the consuming public at fair prices an adequate reservoir of basic agricultural supplies there should be provided by law an ever-normal granary of food, feed, and fiber.

2. Adequate capital funds to underwrite the continuance and enlargement of commodity-loan operations should be made available.

3. Effective and flexible provisions of law are necessary to insure an adequate supply of agricultural products in line with domestic and foreign demand at parity prices on all basic crops. There must be initiated and maintained a balance between the production of farm products and the consumptive requirements therefor. This can be accomplished most effectively through production adjustment, coupled with farmer control of surpluses under a system of commodity loans; and

4. The continuance of the national soil-conservation program to restore and maintain soil fertility and to secure the proper utilization of the Nation's soil resources in guaranteeing to the future generations an abundance of the necessities of life; and

5. The reenactment or strengthening of provisions of law covering marketing agreements on dairy products and nonbasic crops is necessary to maintain parity prices.

6. The Federal law requiring State administration of the national soil-conservation program should be postponed through amendment until January 1940.

7. An equitable and permanent revenue and fiscal policy should be provided by law that will insure the successful operation and maintenance of the foregoing programs.

The American Farm Bureau Federation emphasizes the necessity for the enactment of legislation during the present session of Congress to:

1. Extend Presidential authority to revalue gold until such time as a monetary authority is established.

2. Continue for 2 years the 3½-percent interest rate on farm mortgages in the Federal land banks.

3. Secure the continuation of the program of the Rural Electrification Administration.

4. Secure the continuation of the program of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

5. Expand foreign trade by means of reciprocity treaties entered into after public hearings and with the most-favored-nation clause eliminated.

6. Maintain a continuance of our quarantine regulations necessary to properly protect American livestock and farm products.

7. Control monopolies and reduce excessive tariff rates.

8. Center conservation activities which relate to organic resources in the United States Department of Agriculture.

9. Penalize oleomargarine in the manufacture of which imported ingredients are used.

10. Coordinate and consolidate all Federal agricultural agencies for purposes of economy and efficiency.

11. Provide adequate appropriations for the land-grant institutions, Agricultural Extension Service, and vocational education.

12. Provide for a Federal experimentation in crop insurance on wheat only if a sound actuarial program can be developed.

13. Provide an opportunity for worthy young farmers and efficient tenants to become farm owners by a liberalized loaning policy under the administration of the Agricultural Department and the Farm Credit Administration.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. VANDENBERG. I submit a concurrent resolution, which I ask to have read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4), as follows:

Whereas Congress has adopted the Social Security Act to insure greater economic security for certain groups against the hazards of old age, unemployment, and other disabilities, and these objectives meet with common approval; and

Whereas there are certain major defects in the act which, if uncorrected, will impede the full attainment of these objectives; and

Whereas the operation of the contributory old-age pension plan upon a so-called full reserve basis (totaling $47,000,000,000 by 1980) needlessly creates a fiscal and economic menace and needlessly reduces the average pension payable in 1942 to less than $20 per month (compared with an estimated $46 per month in 1980), thereby needlessly penalizing both the pensioner and the youth of the land who must make up the difference from their private funds in supporting their elders; and

Whereas the full reserve plan makes it necessary to increase from 2 percent to 6 percent in 12 years the supporting pay-roll taxes paid equally by employer and employee with the result that the lowest income groups of American labor are taxed for national debt retirement (through Government bonds acquired for reserve account) instead of the traditional debt-retirement method of imposing taxes on those best able to pay; and

Whereas it is now generally recognized that this so-called reserve plan is unnecessary in a compulsory, tax-supported system; and

Whereas the contributory old-age pension plan discriminates against large groups of citizens, including farm labor, domestic servants, and the self-employed; and

Whereas the Social Security Board has a large research staff of upwards of 140 members, with annual appropriations approximating $400,000, which is available to develop prompt studies to correct these situations: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Social Security Board is directed to report to Congress not later than May 1, 1937, the necessary plans, with its recommendations thereon, to abandon the full reserve system in respect to contributory old-age pensions, and—

(1) To increase pensions to those retiring within the next 10 to 20 years without, however, increasing pensions for those retiring in later years, and to commence payment of pensions to those retiring in 1939 instead of 1942; and to provide that pay-roll taxes (equally divided between employer and employee) remain at the present level of 2 percent for at least 5 years and thereafter until Congress finds an increase necessary to meet requirements and maintain a reasonable contingency reserve, thus avoiding the early and arbitrary increase in these taxes to 6 percent within 12 years.

(2) Alternatively to leave benefit payments as now provided by law and to provide that pay-roll taxes (equally divided between employer and employee) shall remain at the present level of 2 percent for at least 10 years and thereafter until Congress finds an increase necessary to meet requirements and maintain a reasonable contingency reserve.

(3) To provide for the extension of the contributory old-age pension system to large groups, such as domestic servants and farmers, now excluded from the benefits of the act, and to provide the simplifications necessary to make this possible.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In connection with the printing of the resolution in the RECORD I ask unanimous consent to have printed also a statement and memorandum in explanation of it.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOINT STATEMENT OF EXPLANATION BY SENATORS VANDENBERG AND TOWNSEND AND REPRESENTATIVES REED OF NEW YORK AND JENKINS OF OHIO

We are completely sympathetic with the objectives of the Social Security Act. Any changes in it should be strengthening changes. It was passed hurriedly 1 year ago, and all informed persons agree that it needs substantial correction. We raise the basic point and ask for a report thereon, that most of its mistakes and weaknesses attach to the fact that its contributory old-age pensions are based on the full reserve system. We submit that such a reserve is unnecessary in a compulsory, tax-supported system; that its ultimate accumulation of a $47,000,000,000 reserve is a positive menace to free institutions and to sound finance and that it is a perpetual invitation to the maintenance of an extravagant public debt; that it will, in effect, transfer the burden of debt retirement from the shoulders of general taxpayers to the shoulders of the lowest income group of the country in the form of a gross income tax on labor; and that it involves a needlessly high pay-roll tax in the immediate years to come and a needless postponement of earlier and more adequate benefit payments.

Sweden, probably the most progressive country in the field of social legislation, furnishes strong evidence against the use of the principle of the reserve fund. After trying it for years, Sweden dropped it and is now on a pay-as-you-go basis.

There is no analogy between the need of private insurance companies for full reserves and the need of the Government system for full reserves. The former are at the mercy of uncertain and fluctuating revenues. The latter is compulsory and is guaranteed a continuous flow of revenues.

It seems desirable, therefore, to provide for the repeal of the full reserve plan and the substitution of a direct pay-as-you-go system with only a small contingent reserve.

This will achieve several healthful results. The progressively increasing pay-roll taxes in the present Social Security Act assessed on both employer and employee—2 percent to 1940, 3 percent to 1943, 4 percent to 1946, 5 percent to 1949, and 6 percent thereafter—are largely necessary only to build up the forty-seven billion of reserves. We are advised by competent authorities that with this latter monstrous burden curtailed, it will be possible for at least 5 years to rest on the present 2-percent tax and at the same time to improve social security under the act.

We believe, for example, that benefit payments can commence within a year or two instead of waiting until 1942, as the law now provides. We believe that increased benefit payments are possible for workers now in middle age who will, if existing law be not changed, receive only a pittance at the age of 65. Thus the average benefit payment in 1942 will be about $18 a month as against an average of $46 per month in 1980, unless the former is corrected as we believe to be possible. This would not mean increased benefit payments to the younger workers of today when they are old. But it would mean that these younger workers will be relieved of a large part of the burden which otherwise would be imposed upon their private funds for the care of their elders.

We also ask the Social Security Board to formulate plans for the extension of the old-age benefit system to certain groups now excluded, such as agricultural workers and domestic servants. These groups now can receive old-age assistance only on the humiliating basis of a pauper test.

We submit these suggestions for the expert study of the Social Security Board, believing these objectives to be sustained by the best available experts in the field of social security and social insurance. The Board has a research staff of 150 experts and a research fund of about half a million dollars. It is equipped to explore all of these possibilities. We are asking Congress to authorize and direct the exploration.

The basic question is the reserve system. If it be deemed wise to leave benefit payments at existing levels, we are confident that the abandonment of needless and often menacing reserves would make it possible to also abandon increased pay-roll taxes on employer and employee for at least 10 years to come. The ultimate decision whether to increase benefits or to reduce pay-roll taxes for a longer period will be for Congress to make in the light of the facts that will be developed by this study. Either objective is infinitely worth while.

MEMORANDUM SUPPORTING RESOLUTION ON SOCIAL SECURITY

The Social Security Act provides for a plan of old-age benefits financed through the use of a so-called reserve account. Money collected by pay-roll taxes levied on both the employee and the employer is supposedly deposited in a reserve account. These taxes, now 2 percent, will by 1949 have increased to 6 percent. The idea of the reserve account is founded upon the use of the investment analogy transferred from the field of private insurance, which does not apply to a social-security plan financed through the use of the Federal taxing power. According to the act, money collected through pay-roll taxes, insofar as it is in excess of funds needed for making current benefit payments, is to be invested in Government bonds paying 3-percent interest or more. These bonds can be bought in the open market or can be new issues paying this rate of interest.

Most of the money collected in taxes based on pay rolls will not be used for current payments to beneficiaries of the account when payments begin in 1942. But by 1980 all of the receipts from pay-roll taxes plus $1,406,000,000 in so-called interest will be required. Consequently, people now in middle age will, on retirement, receive much smaller benefit payments than those now starting work who are covered by insurance. For example, the average rate of benefit payment in 1942 will be approximately $18 per month, whereas the average rate of benefit payment in 1980 will be approximately $46 per month. As a consequence of the low rate of benefit payments for those who are now in middle age or older, an unusual burden will be placed upon the young people of the present generation for the care of their parents when they reach old age. This burden will not be placed upon the young people of the next generation, because by that time those retiring will have been insured for practically all their working years.

This situation results from the use of the reserve principle as a basis for the old-age benefits. As previously indicated, the funds in the old-age benefit reserve account must be invested in Government bonds. These may be either outstanding issues now held in private hands paying 3-percent interest on the purchase price or they may be merely newly issued bonds bearing 3-percent interest.

Certain important results follow from these provisions. If bonds now privately held are purchased for the account, the Government will be buying up evidences of its own indebtedness. Nominally these bonds will be held in the reserve account. But actually this will constitute a retirement of the debt. Certainly it is not logical to speak of the Government's being indebted on its own obligations when held by itself. If the bonds for the account are obtained through this method, then the public debt will be retired by means of taxes levied on the gross earnings of the lower income groups—groups least able to carry this type of regressive taxation. The payment of such taxes reduces the purchasing power of a large portion of the population whose standard of living is already much lower than is desirable. It never has been the policy of the National Government to retire the public debt through taxes on the lower-income groups. Money for the retirement of the public debt has in practically all cases been drawn from the general-fund revenues, and the general fund has been primarily raised through taxes on those who are more able to pay than those people who will now be paying the larger part of the pay-roll taxes.

If, on the other hand, the Treasury issues new bonds for the reserve account, the cash position of the Treasury is thereby increased, although the obligations of the Federal Government are increased by an equivalent amount. Now, what can the Government do with the money received from the taxes based upon pay rolls when new bonds are issued? One possibility is that these funds could remain unspent in the Treasury. Another possibility is that the money could be used for meeting current expenditures of the Government. This might encourage a higher level of Government expenditures than would exist if such funds were not placed in the Treasury. A third possibility is that the Treasury could use these funds for the purchase of outstanding Government bonds paying interest of less than 3 percent. This would have the same consequences as outlined previously. In any event, there will be no money left in the Public Treasury to actually earn interest for the account. The money will have been spent. Money spent cannot earn interest.

From figures contained in reports of congressional committees on the social-security bill it is evident that by 1980, 40 percent of the old-age benefit payments will come from the so-called interest on the bonds held in the reserve account. But one cannot correctly speak about the bonds in this account earning interest. If outstanding public debt is bought up by funds in the account, it would not be logical for the Government to continue to pay interest on its own obligations when it holds them itself. If, on the other hand, new bonds were issued for the account, the money will actually have been used for current expenditures or for debt retirement, and money that does not exist cannot earn interest. What really happens is that by 1980 the old age benefit reserve account will require a subsidy from general-fund revenues of 40 percent of the total benefit payments. No one opposes granting a subsidy where necessary for the payment of old-age benefits. We should not, however, hide the fact that the Federal Government is paying such a subsidy and we should not finance old-age benefits in such a manner that the subsidy is more than is necessary for this purpose. But under the present plan that is actually happening. As a result of using the reserve account, more money is being collected from employers and employees in insured occupations than is actually necessary for current benefit payments. The excess funds will be spent for the purpose of debt retirement or for meeting current expenditures of the Government.

A large portion of the people of this country are excluded from the operations of the old age benefit provisions of the Social Security Act. Among these excluded groups are agricultural laborers and domestic servants. These people cannot come within the terms of the act and consequently in their old age they can receive only old-age assistance as provided in title I of the Social Security Act. This assistance is not given as a right but is given as a privilege. It is given only where there is a showing of need. Thus the people in these noninsured occupations can receive such assistance only after they have undergone the humiliating procedure of a needs test.

There is a marked incompatibility between the old age benefit plan provided for in title II of the Social Security Act as it now exists and the system of old-age assistance provided in title I of the act. In 1942 the average man in an insured occupation and his wife will receive only an average benefit payment of approximately $18 a month. But a man who had been employed in a noninsured occupation will with his wife be able to receive up to $60 a month for old-age assistance. It should also be noted that payments for old-age assistance under title I of the Social Security Act began in 1936, but payments under the contributory old-age benefit plan will not begin until 1942.

It seems desirable, therefore, that the Social Security Act should be so amended as to provide for the repeal of the full reserve plan and to substitute in its place a direct pay-as-you-go system with a small contingent reserve. The adoption of this plan will permit the continuance of the present 2-percent tax—1 percent on the employer and 1 percent on the employee—for a number of years beyond the period now provided for in the act. This plan will avoid the imposition of a heavy tax upon lower income groups for the purpose of retiring the public debt or for providing current revenues.

Some contend that if we do not have the full reserve plan a 10 percent pay-roll tax will be required to meet payments by 1980. A Government subsidy bearing part of the cost of the plan will make any such pay-roll tax unnecessary. Such a subsidy is already provided for in the Social Security Act. There it masquerades under the title of "interest." The Federal Government can afford to pay such a subsidy since it will not have to pay out of the general fund interest on the $47,000,000,000 old-age benefit reserve account.

Sweden, a progressive country in the field of social legislation, furnishes strong evidence against the use of the principle of the reserve fund. The original plan set up in Sweden provided for the existence of a reserve fund based upon the private insurance analogy. A few years ago a special royal commission was set up in Sweden to study the whole problem of financing the old-age benefits. After long study this commission submitted a report advocating the abolition of the reserve and the substitution of a pay-as-you-go plan. The recommendations contained in this report were adopted. This year Sweden began a pay-as-you-go plan.

If we adopt a pay-as-you-go plan, we can begin benefit payments within a year or two—say, in 1939. Without raising the normal level of benefit payments we can increase the benefits to those retiring in the next few years. This will not increase the benefits paid to people who will have been insured during most of their working years. But it will relieve the present younger generation from a large part of the burden imposed upon their private funds for the care of their aged parents. This will tend to bring the amounts paid as old-age benefits more into line with amounts paid as direct old-age assistance.

Holding down the tax to 2 percent temporarily, increasing immediate benefit payments, and starting them earlier appear feasible. There is very good reason to believe that the Social Security Board can formulate workable plans to accomplish these objectives. A 2-percent tax would in 1950 yield $625,000,000. Benefit payments as required by the present act would amount to $505,000,000. This would leave a margin of $120,000,000 to finance the increased cost of benefit payments as here suggested. This takes no account of any interest which may be credited on possible reserve accumulations.

It is also desirable to formulate plans for the extension of the old-age benefit system to certain excluded types of employment, such as domestic servants and agricultural laborers. Many of these people desire to come within the terms of the act but find it impossible. It is not fair to people who pay taxes for their old-age benefits to have others not in insured occupations receive old-age assistance without direct cost.

The resolution asks a study not only of all the foregoing considerations, but also of an alternative which would leave benefit payments at their levels as now established in the present Social Security Act and take full advantage of the abandonment of the full reserve basis in the form of a longer postponement of any increase in pay-roll taxes on employer and employee. It is suggested that the 2-percent tax—instead of increasing 1 percent each 3 years until it reaches 6 percent—can he held at 2 percent for at least 10 years if the full reserve be abandoned. The question whether it is preferable to use a portion of these savings, incident to the abandonment of a needless reserve, in hastening benefit payments and leveling off some of their more immediate inequities, or in using all of these savings to postpone an increase in the pay-roll taxes, will be a policy question for Congress to decide in the light of the full facts as reported by the Social Security Board.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar, under rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will state the first bill.

The bill (S. 766) to provide for the reimbursement of certain enlisted men and former enlisted men of the Navy for the value of personal effects destroyed in a fire at the radio direction finder station, North Truro, Mass., on December 27, 1934, was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, ATCHISON, KANS.

The bill (S. 62) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the constituents in whose behalf I had asked a hearing on the bill have now advised that they do not care to oppose it. I have no further objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Atchison, Kans., authorized to be built by the city of Atchison, Kans., and the county of Buchanan, Mo., or either of them, or the States of Kansas and Missouri, or either of them, or the highway departments of such States, acting jointly or severally, by an act of Congress approved June 18, 1934, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 18, 1937.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

FRED M. MUNN

The bill (S. 110) for the relief of Fred M. Munn was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Fred M. Munn, who served as a private in Troop L, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on January 10, 1878: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

DANIEL YATES

The bill (S. 113) for the relief of Daniel Yates was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and their widows and dependent relatives Daniel Yates, formerly private, Battery D, First Regiment Artillery, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private on June 24, 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. VANDENBERG subsequently said: Mr. President, a bill was passed just a moment ago for the relief of Daniel Yates. The bill was adversely reported on by the War Department in a very emphatic report. I ask that the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed may be reconsidered and the bill restored to the calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his objection for a moment, I should like to make a brief statement with reference to the bill. The Senator from Michigan must know, I am quite sure, although he is not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, that the War Department always makes an adverse report in these cases. It makes the same report on good bills, bad bills, and every kind of bill having a similar object in view.

The man Yates was charged with desertion. He disappeared in 1899 and was not heard of for many years. Finally he was found in Canada somewhere only a few years ago. The evidence submitted to the committee shows that he was insane when he deserted, has been insane ever since, and is insane today.

Because of these facts, established to the satisfaction of the committee, the committee was of the opinion that he should not be charged with desertion when he did not have a mind capable of knowing what the act meant or the consequences of it. Proof that he has been insane since was submitted to the committee in the form of affidavits. I believe the bill ought to pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the bill go over for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed are reconsidered, and the bill will be passed over.

CHARLES WILSON

The bill (S. 293) for the relief of Charles Wilson was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Charles Wilson shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on October 27, 1931, as a private, Headquarters Company, First Battalion, Fifty-third Regiment United States Infantry: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

JOHN C. REYNOLDS

The bill (S. 295) to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service of John C. Reynolds was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to cause the recommendation of the award of a decoration to John C. Reynolds, formerly a private, first class, Company A, Fourth Infantry, United States Army, American Expeditionary Forces, for distinguished conduct in rescuing wounded in battle on October 2, 3, and 4, 1918, near Nantillois, France, and Montfaucon, France, and during the battle of the Meuse-Argonne, to be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and such award made to said Reynolds as his conduct merits.

GUSTAF E. LAMBERT

The bill (S. 115) to amend the act entitled "An act to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever", approved February 28, 1929, by including therein the name of Gustaf E. Lambert, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever", approved February 28, 1929, is amended by inserting after the name of John J. Moran, wherever it appears in such act, the name of Gustaf E. Lambert.

BENJAMIN H. SOUTHERN

The bill (S. 223) for the relief of Benjamin H. Southern was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Army Benjamin H. Southern shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Army on the 31st day of March, 1919: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the pasage of this act.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

The resolution (S. Res. 69), which had been reported by Mr. NEELY from the Committee on Rules on the 27th instant, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Vice President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a select committee of nine Members of the Senate to be known as the Select Committee on Government Organization, for the purpose of considering and reporting upon the subject matter contained in the message of the President of the United States of January 12, 1937. All bills and resolutions introduced in the Senate proposing legislation concerning reorganization, coordination, consolidation, or abolition of, or reduction of personnel in organizations or units in the executive branch of the Government shall be referred by the Vice President to the said Select Committee on Government Organization. The said Select Committee on Government Organization is hereby authorized to report to the Senate at any time by bill or otherwise with recommendations upon any matters covered by this resolution; and any bill or resolution so reported shall be placed upon the calendar and have a privileged status.

That said committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States whether or not the Senate is sitting, has recessed, or adjourned; to hold such hearings; to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents by subpena or otherwise and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Vice President or the chairman of said committee, and shall be served by any person designated by them or either of them. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the matter herein authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by sections 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., title 2, secs. 192, 193, and 194).

JOINT COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 7, to strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine", so as to make the clause read:

The joint committee shall be composed of nine Members of the Senate appointed by the President of the Senate, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, line 9, before the word "Members", to strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine", so as to make the clause read:

The joint committee shall be composed of nine Members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and nine Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I submit an inquiry to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the joint resolution provide for a committee of seven members from each body?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will state in explanation that the House has already established its committee and since, under the proceedings of the joint committee, each body will vote as a unit, the House prefers to retain its membership at seven, having already created its committee, but is perfectly willing, as I am informed, that the Senate shall have nine members. The controlling reason which prompted the Committee on Rules to amend the joint resolution, increasing the membership on the part of the Senate from seven to nine, is to give opportunity for representation to all groups in the Senate on an approximately fair ratio or basis. It was impossible to work that out under the limitation of seven members.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Under the provisions of the joint resolution will the committee created parallel the so-called Byrd committee, or are they to function together?

Mr. ROBINSON. The proceedings under the joint resolution now before us will not interfere with any proceedings the Byrd committee may take. We merely follow the procedure in the House and seek to coordinate the efforts of the two bodies in the matter.

Mr. KING. I have had no opportunity to examine carefully the joint resolution. Is the joint resolution broad enough to accomplish what I know all Senators desire, a thorough investigation of the departments and agencies of the Government with a view to recommending reorganization, cutting out duplication, and promoting a general improvement in the organization of the Federal Government?

Mr. ROBINSON. I answer the Senator that the joint resolution is broad enough to comprehend all the purposes he has mentioned. The joint resolution expressly provides for all those subjects and is very comprehensive.

Mr. KING. Does it call for recommendations by the committee?

Mr. ROBINSON. It does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That (a) there is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be known as the Joint Committee on Government Organization (hereinafter referred to as the joint committee).

(b) The joint committee shall be composed of nine Members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and seven Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the joint committee—

(a) To investigate the organization and activities of the departments, independent establishments, bureaus, boards, commissions, divisions, services, offices, and other agencies of the Government, with the view to determining whether, in the interest of simplification, efficiency, or economy, or in order to eliminate conflicting or overlapping activities, any of such organizations or units should be coordinated or consolidated with any other organization or unit, reorganized, or abolished, or the personnel thereof reduced; and

(b) To report, from time to time, to the Senate and the House of Representatives the results of its investigations, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

SEC. 3. The joint committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall have power to hold hearings and to sit and act at such places and times, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of said joint committee, and shall be served by any person designated by him. Amounts appropriated for the expenses of the joint committee shall be disbursed one-half by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House.

SEC. 4. The joint committee shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary for the performance of its duties, but the compensation so fixed shall not exceed the compensation fixed under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, for comparable duties. Officers and employees of the Government shall be detailed to the service of the joint committee, on its request, without additional compensation, and such officers and employees shall be paid from the appropriations regularly available for their salaries.

DEBATE ON GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS—AMENDMENT TO RULES

The resolution (S. Res. 8) limiting debate on general appropriation bills was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the resolution should at least be explained and receive some consideration. I have read it, and to me it seems it is the camel's nose under the tent with reference to cloture.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is a very important proposed change in the rules of the Senate. A similar rule exists at this time in reference to amendments to appropriation bills. This resolution lays down the same rule as to debate on appropriation bills. However, there is one change in the proposed rule. At present, the question of germaneness is submitted by the Chair to the Senate. Under the proposed rule, it is to be decided by the Chair.

I am not prepared at this time to present my views on the subject matter. It involves many complications; and, briefly, for that reason, I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

That completes the calendar.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] particularly. I ask unanimous consent that during the recess or adjournment to follow this session the Committee on Appropriations have leave to submit a report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have taken a very decisive stand on that subject, and particularly with regard to requests of that nature, in years gone by. If this request is granted, automatically the bill will come up for consideration on the next legislative day without opportunity being given for study or notice to Members. For that reason I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement in the hearing of the Senator from Oregon, and ask him for the present to consider withholding his objection.

There is no business on the calendar. Of course, I can move that the Senate adjourn until tomorrow; and, in that event, if the Appropriations Committee is ready to submit its report at that time, it can report tomorrow. That, however, would necessitate a session of the Senate Saturday at which, in all probability, no business would be transacted save the presentation of a single report. I am not even assured that the committee will be ready to report at that time.

Of course, no effort will be made to take up the bill until it is in order to do so. The Senate, however, has frequently given consent in conformity to such requests; and I point out to the able Senator from Oregon that objection to the request will merely compel Senators to be in attendance on the Senate tomorrow for what is a more or less administrative act, namely, to receive and register the report. There is no disposition to press unduly action on the bill referred to. I am now informed that the report will be ready to come in tomorrow. If the objection should be persisted in, of course, I should have to ask that the Senate hold a session tomorrow.

It is well understood that there is considerable necessity for prompt action regarding this particular appropriation bill. I do not undertake to say that the funds which are available for relief have been completely exhausted, but we all know that enormous amounts are being necessarily expended in forms of relief that were not anticipated when the bill was originally in process of drafting.

I should like the Senate to have an opportunity to proceed to the consideration of the bill on Monday, if it is then ready to do so; and, in order that that opportunity may be preserved, it will be necessary to hold a session of the Senate tomorrow for the single purpose, so far as I am now informed, of receiving this report.

I ask the Senator from Oregon, if, under those circumstances, he will not withdraw his objection.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is always pleasing to be obliging. There are fundamental reasons which I entertain why haste should not be employed in considering a bill of this magnitude, which carries nearly a billion dollars. The matter of 24 hours is immaterial as compared with the necessity of a proper understanding of the bill.

Repeatedly I have assumed this position, which I believe to be correct, in the interest of careful legislation. Even though it may inconvenience some Members of the Senate to require them to be here tomorrow, I persist in my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the terms of Senate Resolution 69, agreed to today, the Chair appoints as the Select Committee on Government Organization the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

LIMITATION OF JURISDICTION IN INJUNCTION CASES

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, on day before yesterday I introduced a bill proposing to limit the jurisdiction and power of district and circuit judges to issue injunctions in certain cases. On the same day the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] discussed questions more or less relating to the same subject. The discussion grew out of a decision made and an injunction granted by a district judge in my State; and, as we all know, it grew out of questions arising concerning an act of Congress creating what is known as the Tennessee Valley Authority. In this connection I want also to discuss the question of a pooling arrangement suggested by some between the power companies and the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Today I desire very briefly to point out the facts which bring that pooling arrangement before the public at this time, and then to discuss very briefly the bill which I introduced.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the suggested power-pooling agreement between the Tennessee Valley Authority and the private power companies.

With an injunction issued by a single Federal district judge, in full force and effect against practically all the power activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority, issued upon the petition of the several and combined power companies of that section, putting at naught the act of Congress establishing the Tennessee Valley Authority, and virtually halting and tying up the entire Tennessee Valley Authority program, to enter into such a pooling agreement now, or even to suggest such an agreement with these power companies, would be an abject confession of failure of the plans and purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Besides, some time ago, before the suit and before the injunction, possibly at the suggestion of the Chairman of the Authority, our great President, seeking to be fair and just to all, called a conference of the Tennessee Valley Authority and representatives of the private power companies here in Washington to talk over their mutual interests. This conference came to naught, and any like conference which would be beneficial to the interests of the people would likely have the same failure. The President has recently publicly declared that no more such conferences will be called, and in this, I think, he is entirely right.

Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me that any official of the Tennessee Valley Authority would now even suggest such a pooling arrangement, and any official making such a suggestion confesses his own belief that the power policies of the Tennessee Valley Authority are a failure, and it seems to me such official would not care longer to remain with the Authority.

In spite of the dissension in the Tennessee Valley Authority ranks, and in spite of some official inefficiency and incompetence, and even in spite of the pessimism of some of the officials having charge of this Authority, the Tennessee Valley Authority has, in my judgment, made substantial progress all along the line, and already great good has been accomplished in that prices of electric current have been greatly reduced, and as the project continues other large reductions in prices to the people will be made, and all to the greatest benefit to the plain people of this country,

Mr. President, I believe the Tennessee Valley Authority will bring about a permanent system of vastly cheaper power and a wonderfully increased use of power, to the great benefit of all the farmers, all the manufacturers, and all the city dwellers in the Tennessee Valley Authority section of the country, and eventually it will bring about tremendously cheaper electric-current rates to the entire country.

However, with the pooling agreement, the reductions in prices already made, as well as expected reductions, would soon disappear, and the Government would necessarily take its place as a helpless minority of one of the greatest and most active monopolies in the world—the power monopoly.

The pooling arrangement as proposed must not even be considered at this time, and I say this notwithstanding the recent opinion of the Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority. If the Chairman has cold feet on the aims and purposes of the Authority, if he has reached the conclusion that it can only properly succeed by combining and confederating with the power companies in a trust in restraint of trade, that it cannot succeed on its own merits, and that it cannot work out its own problems, then it seems to me he would wish to retire from the Authority and let another, of greater courage and of firmer opinion and of higher belief in the merits of the plans and policies of the Tennessee Valley Authority as established by law, take his place.

Mr. President, no one desires to confiscate the properties of the private power companies. One of the main purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority is to bring about cheaper light and power rates to the people. That Authority and the various cities, counties, and States which are given preference under the act should be willing, and I believe they are willing, to buy the plants of the private companies in the Tennessee Valley Authority territory and pay for them the par value of the bonds and preferred stock of such companies. This is a great deal more than what these same securities were selling for 4 years ago.

As I remember, the preferred stock in the principal companies in our section 4 years ago was selling for somewhere around 20 cents a share. Today it is selling for several times that amount, and, as I recall it, is almost at par.

I believe, further, that the Authority, in cooperation with at least some of the cities taking power from the Authority, might even go a little further and pay a reasonable though small price for the common stock of these companies, rather than to continue in litigation. Notwithstanding the fact that the owners of such common stock of these companies probably never paid any real money for that common stock, and everyone knows that the common stock in most of these utilities is what is known as "watered stock", the owners of these stocks have enjoyed rich returns on such watered stocks for a long, long time. The people have long rebelled, but until the Government got interested in Muscle Shoals and organized the Tennessee Valley Authority, they have had little chance to get light and power at reasonable rates.

Mr. President, in my judgment, there will be no backward step taken in this matter. The Tennessee Valley Authority must go forward along the lines originally planned. It must go vigorously about the tasks to which it has been assigned. It must constitute the yardstick by which electric current is sold in this country. The Authority must go on if we are to have any relief from exorbitant light and power rates. It has been harried by the private companies ever since it came into existence. It has been litigated against and its purposes misconstrued and its objects decried by those who are profiting by unjust exactions from the people in the way of rates. This should not be so. The Authority should be given a fair chance. It should be given an honest and fair test. It should have a fair opportunity on its merits.

Now a word about the injunction recently issued by one of our Federal judges prohibiting and inhibiting any further development of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I have known Judge John J. Gore, who issued the injunction in behalf of these private power companies, long and favorably. I do not criticize him. I am assuming that he acted in accordance with his view of the law and the right. I can only say that I indeed regret that he saw fit to issue the injunction. Under our Constitution, I doubt exceedingly if he has either the jurisdiction or the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional and to issue an injunction against the administration of such act of Congress.

Mr. President, I have read many times the history of our Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787. There is no provision in the Constitution which gives even our Supreme Court the right to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional and void. No one can put his finger on any express provision of the Constitution which gives to the Supreme Court that right. In conferring jurisdiction on the Supreme Court, our Constitution makers were careful enough to enumerate the various subjects of jurisdiction. In that list the jurisdiction and power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional nowhere occurs. Under the well-known rules of construction of statutes, the enumeration of this list excludes all other subjects.

Further than that, Mr. Madison, one of the delegates of the Constitutional Convention, presented for adoption a provision to read as follows:

> Every bill which shall have passed the two Houses shall, before it becomes a law, be severally presented to the President of the United States and to the judges of the Supreme Court for the revision of each. If upon such revision they shall approve of it, they shall respectively signify their approbation by signing it; but if upon such revision it shall appear improper to either or both to be passed into a law, it shall be returned with the objections against it to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal and proceed to reconsider the bill; but if after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House when either the President or a majority of the judges shall object, or three-fourths where both shall object, shall agree to pass it, it shall, together with the objections, be sent to the other House; by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds or three-fourths of the other House, as the case may be, it shall become a law (Madison Papers, vol. 3, p. 1332).

Mr. Madison's amendment was defeated, and the provision was made that only the President could negative a law, but that his negative could be overruled by a two-thirds vote of each House.

In the discussion which followed Mr. Madison's proposal both Delegate Pinckney and Delegate Mercer approved the amendment. Delegate Mercer "disapproved the doctrine that the judges as expositors of the Constitution shall have authority to declare a law void" (Madison Papers, vol. 3, p. 1333).

Delegate Dickinson agreed. He thought "no such power ought to exist" (Madison Papers, vol. 3, p. 1334).

Mr. Gerry, who was the great grandfather of the present distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. PETER G. GERRY, thought the judges might pass upon the constitutionality of acts (Formation of the Union, p. 147).

On the other hand, delegate Luther Martin seemed to think the Supreme Court would have the power to declare a law void (Madison Papers, p. 1166).

Delegate Mason—George Mason of Virginia—joined in this view (Madison Papers, p. 1168).

However, article VI of the Constitution provides:

> This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is true that in 1803 Chief Justice Marshall in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Marbury against Madison held that an act of Congress was unconstitutional, and again in 1857 the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case held another act of Congress unconstitutional. These were the only two such holdings prior to the Civil War.

I digress long enough to say that that was not the holding of the Court, and that was not the holding of Chief Justice Marshall. It was a dictum in which Chief Justice Marshall declared that in his judgment the law under consideration was unconstitutional.

It is true that various interpretations have been placed upon that decision of Chief Justice Marshall, and we take the opinion for what it is worth. That opinion was rendered in 1803, and it was the first opinion which discussed the question of the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress.

I digress here long enough to say that a remarkable thing happened in connection with the Dred Scott decision. That case arose under the Missouri Compromise Act, which was passed by the Congress in 1820. It was supposed to be the law of the land, and was operated under, because questions concerning it came up almost daily. The Missouri Compromise Act was in effect from 1820 to shortly before 1857. While the Dred Scott case was in the breast of the Court, the Congress repealed the Missouri Compromise Act; and what the Court did in declaring the Missouri Compromise Act unconstitutional and void was purely what it would be called if any other body had so decided—an officious action. It had not an act of Congress before it, because the Missouri Compromise Act had already been repealed; but the Court proceeded just as if that act had not been repealed, and delivered an opinion which, in my judgment, brought on the Civil War and was very hurtful to our country.

After the Civil War it is likewise true that, without serious question as to the power of the Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, our Supreme Court held some 60 or 70 acts of Congress unconstitutional and void.

It may be that this long course of conduct in declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional, though there seems to be no express power given to the Court so to declare, confirms such power in our Supreme Court; and for the purpose which I have in mind I am assuming, without argument, that the Supreme Court of the United States has the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. I am a great believer in courts. I honor them and respect them. I believe it is our duty to uphold them. Whether our Constitution gave to the Supreme Court the power to declare an act of the Congress unconstitutional or not, I think it should have done so. I believe they have that power now.

However, whether the writers of our Constitution gave the Supreme Court the power in terms to declare an act unconstitutional or not, certainly I believe that no one familiar with our constitutional history can believe that any one of the 39 framers of our Constitution ever remotely had it in his mind that a judge of an as yet unnamed court—the judge of an inferior court, to use the words contained in the Constitution—would have the right, as soon as that judge got on the bench, to issue an injunction declaring an act of the Congress, under which he held all his powers, unconstitutional, null, and void, and issuing an injunction making his view effective. I do not believe anyone thinks that it was ever intended by any one of the makers of our Constitution that a district judge should have the right to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional and void and then issue an injunction making his individual view overturn the combined purpose of the two Houses of Congress and the President and make an act of Congress null and void.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, the Senator from Tennessee is aware of the rule that all the statutory courts—which means all the courts except the Supreme Court—are creatures of Congress, and Congress has the right to limit their jurisdiction in any way it sees fit. If Congress desires to take away from the inferior courts the right to issue an injunction in any case, it may do so by act of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I am just getting to that point. The purpose of the bill I have introduced is to take away the jurisdiction of an individual district judge to issue an injunction making his views as to the constitutionality of an act effective until after the Supreme Court shall have passed on the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator that that rule, however, does not obtain as to the Supreme Court, since it is a creature of the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator fully. I take exactly the same view—not only that the Supreme Court is the only Court that has jurisdiction but that it has full jurisdiction in the matter. I am not discussing that question at all. The only question I am trying to lay before the Senate today is that we ought to limit the jurisdiction of what the Constitution calls an inferior-court judge, but what we call a district-court judge or a circuit-court judge, to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional and to issue an injunction making that decision effective.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. To carry that view to the extreme, Congress, if it should see fit, could abolish every Federal court except the Supreme Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. It could abolish every single one of them, if it saw fit; and yet, through the course of many, many years, we have sat here and permitted any one of these officials of our creation—these officials who get power solely from the acts of Congress—we have permitted any one of them to overturn what we do.

Permit me to give the Senate an illustration. I see that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. ASHURST] has just come into the Chamber. As the bill I have introduced will go before his committee, I hope I may have his attention for a few minutes.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to say that I always listen with pleasure and with instruction to what the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] says.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator. We have 169 district court judges in the United States. We have 49 circuit court judges in the United States. Each one of them under the rule now in force has the right to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional and void, and to issue an injunction upholding his particular views.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in his excellent address here a day or two ago, called the attention of the Senate to a situation arising out of the very case I am now discussing, the Tennessee Valley case. Senators, this is a remarkable situation.

One of the companies in the section in question went before the district judge in Georgia, Judge Underwood, with a bill alleging in general terms that the T. V. A. Act was unconstitutional, and asking an injunction against its enforcement. I am speaking very generally, of course. Judge Underwood was not there, and another judge took his place. That judge, after hearing arguments, rendered an opinion holding that the act was not unconstitutional, and refused to grant an injunction.

The complainant in the Georgia case then went over to Alabama, and there united with 18 other companies, as I am informed, and filed another bill asking for exactly the same relief before the Alabama judge. In February the proceedings in that court suddenly stopped. No further action was taken. The presumption is that the complainants came to the conclusion that the Alabama judge probably would not grant the injunction. Thereupon the same 19 complainants went over to east Tennessee and filed a bill containing, in substance, the same allegations as previously made, having the same purpose—that is, to declare the Tennessee Valley Authority void, and asking for an injunction against its operations—and there they found that the judge was incompetent because some member of his family owned, I think, 20 shares of stock in one of the power companies, and he very properly had himself excused from trying the case, and called in another district judge.

Judge Gore, about whom I spoke a short while ago, was the judge before whom the case was heard. He held the act unconstitutional, and issued an injunction virtually tying up all the principal work of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. President, I say that it makes no difference whatsoever whether the Supreme Court has the power to declare an act unconstitutional and to direct an injunction to be issued prohibiting it from being carried out or administered; that a district court judge has no such right or power.

Let us see how it would work out. Suppose a district judge who was willing to give that relief could not be readily found. Is it possible that the complainants could go around from one court to another in the entire section where they could get service on the defendant until they had finally found a judge who would grant this relief? Can it be assumed that our forefathers, those who wrote our wonderful Constitution, ever had in mind any such view as that? I think not.

I am now asking the Senate to pass a bill which I have introduced which would take away the jurisdiction and the power in that respect of the district or circuit court judges, as the case may be; not take it away absolutely, but take it away until the Supreme Court has passed upon the constitutionality of an act and, if the Supreme Court held that it was invalid, has directed the injunction to be issued.

Now I desire to speak for a moment of the inferior courts.

The only name given to such courts to be established by the Congress was "inferior courts." In establishing these "inferior courts" the Congress has from time to time fixed their jurisdiction and given the judges thereof the names of "circuit judges" and "district judges." There are 49 circuit judges in the United States at the present time and 169 district judges, 218 in all. These "inferior judges" and these "inferior courts" are established solely in the discretion of the Congress. The acts of Congress establishing them can be repealed at any time, and thus the courts abolished and the judges put out of commission. We have the absolute power over these so-called inferior judges and courts.

To say that these judges, either individually or sitting as a court, purely the creatures of the Congress—and I do not use the word "creatures" in any improper sense—have the right under the Constitution to declare that other acts of Congress are unconstitutional and void and may issue writs of injunction prohibiting the execution of such acts of Congress is to give such "inferior judges" rights so exalted that I doubt if any one of the 39 Delegates that signed the Constitution ever dreamed of giving. There is absolutely no method of construction of the Constitution that would give such an "inferior judge" such jurisdiction or such power.

Probably the only way that such a power could be even conjured up in the wildest of imaginations is to say, first, that the Supreme Court undoubtedly has the power to declare an act unconstitutional; second, that, inasmuch as the Supreme Court is given original jurisdiction in only two cases—suits concerning foreign ambassadors and ministers, and suits brought by a State—therefore, it must have been intended that the "inferior judges" should first pass on the case. Otherwise, the question of constitutionality of acts could not be inquired into by the Supreme Court.

That is the only theory on which it may even be suggested that a district judge has such power. In my judgment, it is a monstrous doctrine to say that any district or "inferior" judge, whose court is purely the creature of the Congress, has the right to declare an act unconstitutional and void and issue an injunction against its enforcement.

If it is necessary for a district judge to pass on an act of Congress in the beginning in order to get the case finally into the Supreme Court, the Congress should certainly limit the district judge as well as the judges of the various courts of appeal individually and as courts from issuing injunctions against the enforcement of an act of Congress until after the Supreme Court acts.

Mr. President, in all of the acts of Congress from the very beginning of our history, creating the "inferior judges" and the "inferior courts" provided for in the Constitution, they have been established by the Congress under terms fixing the jurisdiction of the courts. In the Code of Laws of the United States of America on page 1228 and the following, title 28, sections 41 and the following, the various jurisdictions of these "inferior district courts" are set out in great detail. The specific cases in which such courts shall have jurisdiction are enumerated. In section 41 they are enumerated in 28 different subsections. In sections 43 to 53 are various other cases enumerated in which these "inferior district courts" have jurisdiction. In not a single one of these acts is the power given to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional or to issue an injunction for the enforcement of such a view.

The enumeration of one class, under every recognized method of interpretation, is the exclusion of all other classes not enumerated. Everyone knows that to be so. The Congress in all cases fixes the jurisdiction, determines the procedure, and defines the power of these inferior courts.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Have not the courts always assumed, and on that assumption continually asserted, that the grant of judicial power of the United States to the Supreme Court and to such inferior courts as Congress might ordain and establish carries with it the right to apply the injunctive process? In other words, they assume that that is a part of the judicial power of the courts of the United States, and if we should assume to deprive them of such power they would simply declare the act unconstitutional?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; we do not deprive them of such power. We merely set out the terms on which they may apply the injunctive process and postpone the execution of their decree until the Supreme Court invalidates the act.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that in 1932 the Congress passed what was known as the "labor-disputes" bill, in which they fixed exactly and precisely what facts had to appear before an injunction could issue. The Supreme Court passed on that act and upheld it. There is no question, as I shall show the Senator in a moment—not a particle of question—about the constitutionality of the proposed limitation of the powers of the courts.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. BONE. The Senator will recall the passage of the Clayton amendment to the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BONE. And they were just coldly and purposely junked by the Federal courts as soon as action was taken under the Clayton amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was a different case. It was not a case where the jurisdiction was limited as it is proposed to be limited in this case.

Mr. President, in connection with the bill introduced by me, let me say that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], whom I do not see in the Chamber at the moment, introduced a bill under which the jurisdiction would be left exactly as it is, but providing that there should be a speedy appeal directed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the district courts. It is a very excellent measure. I have used it in the revised bill introduced by me today. I have included the principle of the Black provision in my bill, as I think it is very wise to have as early and immediate determination as possible of the constitutionality of an act by the Supreme Court.

The bill introduced by me specifically provides that in all cases involving the constitutionality of an act of Congress no district or circuit judge shall have the power to issue an injunction preventing the execution of such act of Congress in whole or in part until after the case shall have been appealed and tried, and decided by the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court shall have declared the act unconstitutional, and shall have directed the district or circuit judge, as the case may be, to award such injunction. A district judge may indeed declare an act unconstitutional if he so determines, and an appeal may finally be taken in the case to the Supreme Court, but until the Supreme Court itself acts in the particular case and declares that the act of Congress is null and void and directs the award of an injunction, no injunction shall issue by the district or intermediate judge.

That the Congress has the right thus to limit the jurisdiction and power of "inferior judges" there can be no doubt. On that point I have here the principal cases.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO FIX JURISDICTION OF INFERIOR FEDERAL COURTS

Mr. President, it is well settled that Congress has the power to fix the jurisdiction of the lower Federal courts. The nature of this power is well explained by Mr. Justice Sutherland, speaking for the Court in the case of Kline v. Burke Construction Co. (260 U. S. 226, 233–234 (1922)). I quote from that opinion of Mr. Justice Sutherland, a very learned member of the Supreme Court and a former Member in this body:

> The right of a litigant to maintain an action in a Federal court on the ground that there is a controversy between citizens of different States is not one derived from the Constitution of the United States, unless in a very indirect sense. Certainly it is not a right granted by the Constitution. The applicable provisions, so far as necessary to be quoted here, are contained in article III. Section 1 of that article provides, "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." By section 2 of the same article it is provided that the judicial power shall extend to certain designated cases and controversies and, among them, "to controversies * * * between citizens of different States. * * *" The effect of these provisions is not to vest jurisdiction in the inferior courts over the designated cases and controversies but to delimit those in respect of which Congress may confer jurisdiction upon such courts as it creates. Only the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is derived directly from the Constitution. Every other court created by the General Government derives its jurisdiction wholly from the authority of Congress. That body may give, withhold, or restrict such jurisdiction at its discretion, provided it be not extended beyond the boundaries fixed by the Constitution. (Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. 8, 10; United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 7 Cranch. 32; Sheldon v. Sill, 8 How. 441, 448; Stevenson v. Fain, 195 U. S. 165.)

Now listen to this from the opinion of Mr. Justice Sutherland:

> The Constitution simply gives to the inferior courts the capacity to take jurisdiction in the enumerated cases, but it requires an act of Congress to confer it. The Mayor v. Cooper (6 Wall. 247, 252). And the jurisdiction having been conferred may, at the will of Congress, be taken away in whole or in part; and if withdrawn without a saving clause, all pending cases, though cognizable when commenced, must fall. The Assessors v. Osbornes (9 Wall. 567, 575). A right which thus comes into existence only by virtue of an act of Congress, and which may be withdrawn by an act of Congress after its exercise has begun, cannot well be described as a constitutional right.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE THE ISSUANCE OF INJUNCTIONS IN CASES WHERE THE COURT DOES HAVE JURISDICTION

There are a number of Federal statutes which provide that injunctions shall not be issued by the lower Federal courts in certain types of cases. With respect to such statutes, it has been argued that the jurisdiction of the court having once attached, the decision as to whether an injunction should issue was an exercise of the equity power of the court—that is the question raised by my friend the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE]—hence an inherent part of the judicial power, and the manner of its exercise, could not validly be regulated by Congress. However, the courts have held that Congress may validly regulate the exercise of this power within certain limits (Smith v. Apple, 264 U. S. 274; Levering & Garrigues Co. v. Morrin, 71 Fed. (2d) 284). See also Michaelson v. United States, 266 U. S. 42.

In the case of Levering & Garrigues Co. against Morrin, supra, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit upheld the validity of the Anti-Injunction Act of March 23, 1932, which forbade the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes except in strict conformity with the act. The language of the court is in part as follows:

> It is argued, however, that the deprivation of the district court of its power to issue an injunction in a case which does not involve interstate commerce and where the jurisdiction of the court is based upon diversity of citizenship is tantamount to a grant of jurisdiction with a concurrent withholding of the power to properly administer the causes over which the jurisdiction has been granted, and therefore the statute is unconstitutional within the rule announced in Michaelson v. United States (266 U. S. 42, 45 S. Ct. 18, 69 L. Ed. 162, 35 A. L. R. 451). However, Congress has the power, as now exercised, of withdrawing this jurisdiction from the district court. Congress may give either whole or restricted jurisdiction at its discretion, provided there is no extension beyond the boundaries fixed by the Constitution (Kline v. Burke Construction Co., 260 U. S. 226, 43 S. Ct. 79, 67 L. Ed. 226, 24 A. L. R. 1077), and Congress has the power to regulate the power which it grants (Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. 505, 22 L. Ed. 205; Michaelson v. United States, supra).
> It has been said that the attributes which inhere on a grant of power over a subject and which are inseparable from it cannot be rendered practically inoperative. But the power to issue an injunction is not necessarily within the class of inherent attributes

(Smith v. Apple, 264 U. S. 274, 44 S. Ct. 311, 68 L. Ed. 678). Congress has not exceeded its powers in this legislation.

It should be noted that the Court indicates in its opinion, by implication, that the restriction on the issuance of injunctions might be so sweeping as to be a denial of due process if it denies a litigant all remedy. The cases enjoining the collection of taxes indicate that this is true. Section 3224 of the Revised Statutes provides that no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax may be maintained in any court. Nevertheless, the court has permitted injunctive relief in cases where the purported tax has been construed to be a penalty and not a tax (Lipke v. Lederer, 259 U. S. 557), in cases where the tax has been held unconstitutional (Rickert Rice Mills v. Fontenot, 297 U. S. 110), and in cases where the collection of the tax would result in great hardship (Miller v. Standard Nut Margarine Co., 284 U. S. 509). In the last-cited case the Court said:

> This Court has given effect to section 3224 in a number of cases. It has never held the rule to be absolute, but has repeatedly indicated that extraordinary and exceptional circumstances render its provisions inapplicable.

Thus it appears that a court may refuse to follow a statute of this type even though the statute is admittedly valid.

The Congress may, within certain bounds, regulate the granting of injunctions by courts in cases within the jurisdiction of such courts. However, once jurisdiction of a case is assumed by the court, if it believes that the anti-injunction statute would work great hardship in that case, it may say the statute is invalid because it is a violation the the due-process clause, or it may disregard the statute as in the tax cases cited above.

However, if the statute completely removes certain types of cases from the jurisdiction of the lower Federal courts, as this bill does, there seems to be no reasonable ground to doubt its validity because of the plenary power of the Congress to fix the jurisdiction of such courts.

Mr. President, I have recently examined a document written by Dr. George J. Schulz, of the Congressional Library, analyzing the Federal acts held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It is indeed a most valuable and interesting document, and I think all lawyer Senators, at least, would do well to read it.

The celebrated case of Marbury against Madison, so often referred to as holding an act of Congress unconstitutional, apparently does not do so. That part of the decision is largely dictum of the Chief Justice.

Of course, as we all know, the Dred Scott case, decided in 1857, does in terms declare the Missouri Compromise Act of 1820 unconstitutional. One of the remarkable things about that decision was that the Missouri Compromise Act had already been repealed when the decision was made. There was no necessity of making the decision, and its publication, as we all know, caused one of the greatest conflicts in history.

It is true that after the Civil War a larger number of acts growing out of that conflict was declared unconstitutional. Some of them, like the case of former Attorney General A. H. Garland, of Arkansas, the Legal Tender cases, and the Income Tax case of that period, received wide publicity, but none of them except the Income Tax case and those concerning the rights of colored citizens under amendments to the Constitution are particularly of great importance.

The Myers case, decided by Judge Taft in Two Hundred and Second United States Reports, was an important case because the statute provided that postmasters could be removed only by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. That case held that the President had the right to remove such officers himself.

Mr. President, the document prepared by Mr. Schulz, Acting Director of the Legislative Reference Service, of the Congressional Library, was printed by the Government Printing Office. I do not know whether it is a Senate document or not. If it is not it ought to be. It contains an epitomized statement of each one of the 73 cases the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional in whole or in part, and where there is doubt about whether the Supreme Court passed upon the question of constitutionality, the case is included and made one of the 73.

I hope every Senator will read the document. It is very valuable and very instructive. Dr. Schulz has rendered a very valuable service in preparing it.

Some suggestion was made, following the idea of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], that there might be cases where it would work a great hardship not to have a preliminary injunction. I find that in only 8 of the 73 cases already passed upon was an injunction asked. I find further that in those eight cases if a preliminary injunction had not been granted it would not have affected the case in the slightest, to the disadvantage of the complainant, if the Supreme Court finally adjudged the act unconstitutional.

Under the T. V. A. act we spend some $30,000,000 a year. It would cost the Government millions of dollars if the injunction should remain in effect against that act. The act involves a great public policy which has been established by the Congress. The act has been upheld by the courts up to this date. The Ashwander case, familiar to us all, decided by the Supreme Court, virtually establishes the constitutionality of the act, and yet a single Federal judge, 1 out of 218, has declared the act unconstitutional and has issued a sweeping injunction against it. I am not reflecting upon that judge in the slightest. I believe he is an able and excellent judge. I have no criticism of him at the present time. I simply differ with him and with one of the other judges who decided a similar case. At this point I ask permission to insert in the RECORD as an exhibit to my remarks the opinion in the case to which I have just referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. MCKELLAR. That very distinguished judge, the able Judge John D. Martin, of Memphis, in passing upon a similar application, said that in his judgment a district judge ought not to undertake to overturn a solemn act of Congress enacted by a majority of both branches of Congress and signed by the President unless there was no doubt about the act's unconstitutionality. I think the opinion of Judge Martin, rather than the opinion of Judge Gore, should be sustained.

I am very hopeful that the bill which I am discussing may be reported speedily. I note the presence of several members of the Judiciary Committee. I note that my friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has entered the Chamber, and I invite his special attention to the bill, because he is so greatly interested in the subject. I hope the Judiciary Committee may report the bill speedily and that it may be passed at an early date.

Mr. MINTON and Mr. CONNALLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Indiana, who rose first.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee could hardly expect for the district judge a more favorable verdict at the hands of history than the Supreme Court has enjoyed itself. The Supreme Court, in the three times it has come head-on in collision with the avowed policy of the Congress of the United States—in the Dred Scott decision, the legal-tender decision, and the income-tax decision—has had rendered against it by history an adverse opinion.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, it is true that in the three cases to which the Senator from Indiana refers, the policy of the country was declared by the people to be different from what was held by the Supreme Court. As I stated in the outset, however, while I very seriously doubt whether it was originally ever intended by the framers of our Constitution to give even the Supreme Court the power to invalidate acts of Congress—I know they did not intend to give that power to a district judge or a circuit judge, and I have said that I doubted whether there is any fair basis in the Constitution itself for the power assumed by the Supreme Court in the beginning to invalidate acts of Congress—yet it has been done for so long a time, 134 years, that I believe it would be very unwise for the Congress to undertake at this time to lay down a different rule.

I have gone over these 73 cases; and, with the exception of the Dred Scott case, in which the opinion was rendered after the act was repealed, with the exception of the Legal Tender cases, and the Income Tax case, and with the exception of perhaps one or two other cases, they have not seriously injured the country. I am a great believer in courts. I believe in the Supreme Court. I desire to uphold them in every possible way; but I do think we ought to limit and restrict the right of one of our employees, so to speak—because the Federal circuit and district judges are in a sense the employees of Congress and of the President—to declare acts of Congress invalid and void until after the Supreme Court has passed on the matter.

That is all this bill does. It does not affect the Supreme Court in the slightest degree. On the contrary, it affirms the right of the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress. The bill makes no change at all so far as the Supreme Court is concerned. It merely limits the jurisdiction of the circuit and district judges to issue preliminary injunctions which will tie up acts like the Tennessee Valley Authority Act when they ought not to be tied up.

By the way, I think the only bond that was given or required in that case was a bond for $100,000; and I am reliably informed by members of the Authority that if the injunction is retained—and, of course, the private companies can retain it, simply by appealing, until after the Supreme Court passes upon the question—the losses of the Authority may be many, many millions of dollars.

In all the 73 cases which have been passed upon by the Supreme Court I have found not a single one where it was necessary in the beginning to ask for a preliminary injunction, and only 8 cases in all the 73 where a preliminary injunction was actually asked for. It was not necessary to do it. I hardly think a case could be imagined that would require a preliminary injunction to issue upon the trial judge finding that in his opinion the law was unconstitutional.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that I am not insisting that he yield. I shall be glad to wait until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have about concluded now, but I should like to have the benefit of the views of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

The Senator from Tennessee a moment ago said that he doubted that the 39 signers of the Constitution had anticipated giving to the Supreme Court any power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. I believe he said the number was 39.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there were 39.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought there were more.

Mr. McKELLAR. There were 55 members all told, but only 39 of them signed the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. While the Senator said he entertained that doubt, he also stated that in view of the established practice of the Court, and the general acception of that theory, he now acquiesced in it.

If the Senator from Tennessee were a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, how would he avoid the argument of Mr. Marshall in, I believe, the case of Marbury against Madison, in which he drew this parallel:

Here is one citizen claiming a right under the Constitution of the United States, and another citizen claiming a right under a statute of the United States. When there does come, in a lawsuit properly brought between the Supreme Court, a clash between a constitutional right and a statutory right, and one of them must survive, which one would the Senator from Tennessee decide in favor of—the statute or the Constitution? Is there not an inescapable conclusion to be drawn there, one that cannot be avoided?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I have stated, after very careful study I have reached the conclusion that whatever may have been the intention of our forefathers, the Supreme Court now has the power to declare statutes unconstitutional.

I will say to the Senator, however, that we derive the body of our laws from the British. Our general system is patterned entirely after their general system. They have a constitution. It is true that it is unwritten, but they have what they call a constitution. They have courts.

These courts pass upon the acts of Parliament. The courts do not declare acts of Parliament unconstitutional, and they seem to get along about as well with their decisions under that system as we get along by declaring acts unconstitutional.

I am inclined to think that the Senator is right. If an act of Congress is absolutely contrary to the plain provisions of the Constitution, it is the duty, and after long acquiescence I believe the right, of the Supreme Court to declare it unconstitutional. I am not questioning that in the slightest degree. I am upholding that. I am taking the position in this bill that that right in the Supreme Court is absolute. The only thing this bill does is to take away the jurisdiction of a district judge or a circuit judge to issue an injunction nullifying an act of Congress until after the Supreme Court in that case has passed upon it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to say to the Senator from Tennessee that the junior Senator from Texas is largely in agreement with the Senator's view as to limiting the jurisdiction of the inferior courts.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very happy to hear it.

Mr. CONNALLY. However, a moment ago the Senator suggested something with which I cannot quite agree.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was that?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator pointed out that we derive the common law from England, and that under the English system their courts do not declare acts of Parliament unconstitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me suggest to the Senator that for the very simple reason that the British constitution is not written, the British constitution is whatever the British Parliament enacts in the form of a statute. Therefore, no act of Parliament could be unconstitutional under the British system.

Another thing which suggests that the parallel which the Senator from Tennessee seeks to draw between the British system and the American system is not correct is this:

The British have no dual system of government, as we have. In America we have the dual system. The State has a certain jurisdiction; the Federal Government has a certain jurisdiction; and if there were not somewhere an agency to limit and mark out the proper bounds of State authority as contradistinguished from national authority, we should continually be in a state of chaos by reason of clashes between Federal and State authority as to what each one could do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I entirely agree with the Senator, and I so stated at the very outset of my remarks.

Mr. CONNALLY. That distinguishes our system from the British system or any other continental system that I know about.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know that it does, for this reason: These laws, established virtually by the cabinet of Great Britain——

Mr. CONNALLY. No; they are not established by the cabinet.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is very nearly the case.

Mr. CONNALLY. If I were the Senator from Tennessee I should not raise that point at this time, because Congress has to enact whatever is suggested over here, and Parliament has to enact whatever is suggested in England.

Mr. McKELLAR. Parliament very generally acts as the cabinet asks it to act.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly. The cabinet is the leader there, just as the Executive is the leader here.

Mr. McKELLAR. And they have statutes, just as we have. They call the statutes themselves the constitution, whereas we have a superconstitution or underlying constitution which we call our Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to interrogate him, looking to information to myself?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to have the Senator do so.

Mr. LEWIS. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that he feels that the United States judge having authority under the act to preside should not be allowed to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; my bill specifically provides that he may declare an act unconstitutional if he sees fit, but that he may not issue an injunction, preliminary or interlocutory, upholding his particular view, until the case is appealed swiftly to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court directs that the injunction be issued.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me assume a condition which I trust, while happening in the past, may never again happen in the future—that a Congress is overwhelmingly of one political complexion, and it passes a law which puts a limitation upon speech and expression of the citizens.

Mr. McKELLAR. They could not do that as to the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Apparently not, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not refer to the Senator in my remark, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. I am addressing my question to one to whom I think it does apply, nevertheless. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure that is so, and I am afraid it is applying now.

Mr. LEWIS. I am asking the Senator a question in order that he may gather my viewpoint.

Suppose such a law were passed, practically putting a limitation amounting almost to a criminal penalty upon a citizen whose speech or expression, from the point of view of Congress, ran counter to their interests, and then a writ of habeas corpus were taken and brought before the district court to rescue this man from the imprisonment that he felt to be illegal, and suppose he should contend that the law under which he was being arrested infringed his right of free speech, his right of liberty, and was, therefore, unconstitutional: The court must decide the act unconstitutional in order to give that man relief on his habeas corpus; must it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course; and this bill does not interfere with that action by the court.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator does not take issue with that?

Mr. McKELLAR. My bill does not interfere with that case at all.

Mr. LEWIS. Then must the court suspend its judgment until the Supreme Court acts upon it before it can give liberty to the man?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; not at all. The Senator from Illinois misconceives the purpose of the bill. It does not provide for that at all. My bill deals with jurisdiction and touches the procedure in the issuance of injunctions; that is all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would not the writ of habeas corpus relieve the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McKELLAR. The writ of habeas corpus would relieve the Senator's friend completely. I did not mean his friend; I meant his constituent.

Mr. LEWIS. If he has been wronged in his liberty, he is my friend when the opportunity comes to protect him, wherever he is. If I may be pardoned, however, I meant to say that if the able Senator contended that when a judgment was rendered declaring an act invalid it would first have to go to the Supreme Court to have it affirmed in some expression before it could be executed, the writ of habeas corpus then could not be executed although the court might hold the act invalid and unconstitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will examine the bill, he will find it would not have that effect.

There is another thing I might mention. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has just introduced a bill which provides that all cases involving the validity of an act of Congress shall be appealed directly to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court would pass upon them as soon as possible. I think that would be very helpful and should be incorporated as a section in any bill the committee might report.

EXHIBIT A

In the District Court of the United States, Western District of Tennessee, Western Division

Jacob G. La Croix, plaintiff, v. The United States of America, defendant. No. 1248, equity

ORAL OPINION OF MARTIN, DISTRICT JUDGE, DELIVERED AT THE CONCLUSION OF ARGUMENT OF THE MOTION TO DISMISS

Filed July 29, 1935

This case has been heard on the motion of the United States of America, presented by the assistant district attorney, to dismiss the bill of complaint filed by the plaintiff, who is engaged in the business of operating a slaughterhouse and stockyard and in procuring hog products and in the sale of hog products.

The motion to dismiss questions the right of plaintiff to enjoin the United States of America from collecting the hog-processing taxes pursuant to the act of Congress known as the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The Government maintains that, under title 26, section 154, United States Code, Annotated, the suit cannot be maintained. Said section of the United States Code, provides:

"No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court."

The plaintiff maintains, at the outset, that an injunction should be granted for the reason that there is pending in Congress, with high probability of passage, a bill which would prevent the recovery of processing taxes already paid. This Court thinks it would be an unwarranted encroachment of the judicial power of the United States upon the legislative branch of Government should the Court attempt a race of diligence with Congress to defeat the applicability of an act to a pending case. At most, a court has the right to consider the effect of an act of Congress; at least it cannot attempt to defeat proposed legislation before it has become the law. The Court, therefore, could not properly consider the effect upon an individual of the passage of a pending act which has not become law.

The plaintiff contends that the suit is properly brought under section 41, subsection 20, of the act known as the Tucker Act. The authorities presented by counsel on both sides of the skillful and elaborate 5-hour argument force the conclusion that the United States of America, pursuant to the Tucker Act in the section just cited, may be properly sued for a claim for the recovery of money due plaintiff. But this court thinks that the United States of America cannot be enjoined from the collection of the taxes, but only its appropriate officers and agents may be enjoined from collecting or seeking to collect the taxes. The United States of America functions only through its constituted officials; and an injunction directed against the United States by name in its sovereign capacity would not be maintainable. Who would be restrained by such injunction? It is obviously a very different right to sue the United States of America, pursuant to an act of Congress, and to enjoin the United States of America from the performance of some governmental function, such as the collection of taxes.

It is, therefore, the opinion of this court that the injunction prayed for in this bill is beyond the power of this court to grant, as directed, against the United States of America; and the motion to dismiss the bill will be sustained on this ground.

In the course of the consideration of the numerous questions presented on argument it has been necessary to consider the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and while it is unnecessary for this court to pass upon the constitutionality of this act in the view taken that an injunction cannot be granted against the United States of America in this suit, the court deems it equitable to pass upon the constitutionality of the act and to declare the conclusion reached, because the question will be doubtless again presented by the plaintiff in a new suit, which he would naturally bring against the appropriate officials whom he would seek to enjoin from collection of the challenged taxes.

Counsel for plaintiff has made a most able presentation of his argument against the validity of the act. His argument has been clear-cut and comprehensive, and he has brought forward numerous authorities upon which he bases his vigorous attack upon the constitutionality of the act in question. He has been helpful to the court in considering all of the many phases of the case necessary to be met to arrive at a correct determination of this question. The court will not attempt, in this oral opinion, to review these authorities or to deliver an erudite or elaborate opinion, for the reason that in many districts throughout the United States there are now pending or have been decided like issues here involved; and this case is not, therefore, a case of first impression. The final pronouncement upon the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act will be adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States, perhaps before the end of the year.

Having reached a conclusion upon the constitutional question involved, this court deems it more important to act promptly than to delay a decision for the purpose of writing an elaborate opinion discussiong the authorities.

At the outset, it should be announced that this court holds the firm conviction that a district court of the United States should not suspend the operation of an act of Congress as unconstitutional, except upon the plainest grounds and surest conviction.

In Nichols v. Ames (175 U. S. 509, 514, 515) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"It is always an exceedingly grave and delicate duty to decide upon the constitutionality of an act of the Congress of the United States. The presumption, as has frequently been said, is in favor of the validity of the act, and it is only when the question is free from any reasonable doubt that the Court should hold an act of the lawmaking power of the Nation to be in violation of that fundamental instrument upon which all the powers of the Government rest. This is particularly true of a revenue act of Congress. The provisions of such an act should not be lightly or unadvisedly set aside, although if it be plainly antagonistic to the Constitution, it is the duty of the Court to so declare. The power to tax is one great power upon which the whole national fabric is based. It is as necessary to the existence and prosperity of a nation as is the air he breathes to the natural man. It is not only the power to destroy, but it is also the power to keep alive."

It is the judgment of this court that, before pronouncing an act of Congress unconstitutional and unenforcible, a district court should be even more carefully deliberate and firmly convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of its unconstitionality than would be necessary on the part of a circuit court of appeals or for the Supreme Court of the United States. A district court is a one-man court. There are numerous district courts; and the result of conflicting views of individual district judges as to the unconstitionality of acts of Congress leads to a frequently confusing status in the enforcibility of national laws. Wherefore, district courts should be most reluctant to pronounce acts of Congress void. The soundest public policy is conserved when district courts do not interfere with the operation of acts of Congress. Pending the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, nullification of laws in some districts and their enforcement in other districts leads to much confusion and inequality.

The challenge upon the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is, of course, serious; because certain district judges and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, in a 2-to-1 decision, have already declared the act unconstitutional. Respect for these decisions make the constitutionality of the act a grave question. With due deference to the distinguished judges with whom this court differs, this court does not feel impelled to follow them. Neither the Supreme Court of the United States nor the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals has passed upon the question; and this court is, therefore, free to entertain and express independent views.

First, let us consider the background of the challenged act, the emergency existing at the time of its passage. It is well known that the national situation then existing was extremely desperate. Many men of intelligence and normal courage were almost hopeless of a restoration of normal conditions in America, as a result of what started as an economic depression and ended as an economic collapse. It was evident to men of thought that new measures must be brought forward and enacted into law to restore our country to normal prosperity.

To meet the situation Congress enacted many new laws which, in bygone days, would have seemed unnecessary; but which, when adopted, met with the sweeping approval of the overwhelming majority of the people of the United States, as shown by the ready spirit of cooperation in which our population entered upon accomplishment of the purposes of these laws. In the national disaster in which our country was placed nothing appeared more important than meeting the problem of aiding the farmer to continue to produce. It had been a matter of national discussion in the halls of Congress, in the legislatures of the States, and by people generally as to what means or measures might be adopted to benefit the farmers. And so the Agricultural Adjustment Act was born.

It remained unchallenged as to its unconstitutionality, so far as this court knows, for many months; and an improvement was noted in the agricultural situation and in the common betterment of conditions as the direct and proximate result of the provision of the act.

"The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
The devil got well, the devil a monk was he."

So, when the situation generally had improved, discussion became more current as to the probable unconstitutionality of the act; all of which is said to emphasize the view of this court of the importance of considering the act in the light of the general-welfare clause of the Constitution of the United States, article I, section 8, subsection 1, which provides:

"The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excise, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

In the opinion of this court, reasoning practically, if legislation in time of stress could ever have been needed more for the general welfare of the United States than was the legislation for the benefit of farmers at the time of the passage of this act, the court is in ignorance of any such time. A court of the United States should not be, and cannot be under the doctrines pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States, concerned with the policy of legislation. Provided the legislation is constitutional, the act must be upheld.

It is immaterial, therefore, as to whether the Agricultural Act is deemed expedient, or not. Only the constitutionality of the act must be considered here.

Counsel for plaintiff maintains that the processing tax is not a tax at all. It seems that the complete answer to this is that the tax is paid into the Treasury of the United States and, even though ear-marked, it is still a tax. The fact that the farmer benefits directly from the tax does not prevent the applicability of article 1, section 8, subsection 1, of the Constitution, where the general welfare is likewise conserved.

The most serious question argued by counsel is as to whether—viewing the act in its entirety—there has been a delegation by Congress of the taxing power to the executive department. Most careful consideration has been given to the urgent argument of counsel and to the authorities which he cites. But, an analysis of the act in its entirety leads this Court to the conclusion that, liberally and fairly interpreting this act, resolving every intendment in favor of its constitutionality, the taxing power is not delegated by the act to the Secretary of Agriculture. Congress has singled out and specified cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, etc., as the subject matter of the processing taxes. It must be noted, further, that Congress has fixed the basis of determining the taxes and has not left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture the fixation of the taxes. Congress has delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture only the calculation of the taxes upon the basis fixed by the terms of the act to obtain a parity through the processing tax of prices of farm products existing in 1909–14.

This court finds no single passage in the act which vests in the Secretary of Agriculture an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority and power.

The Supreme Court in its recent decisions has settled the proposition that no matter how grave the emergency, Congress will not be permitted to transcend the Constitution. But it would seem manifest that the Court did not intend to declare that the emergency may not be considered in resolving intendments in favor of the constitutionality of the act in a doubtful case. Any case may be classified as doubtful where United States judges who have passed upon a question have expressed divergent views.

This court is aware that the opinion here rendered is at the moment a minority view; but, with proper deference to the majority of the courts, an independent view may be maintained here in the absence of authority binding this court. This court holds the opinion that the full import and meaning of article I, section 8, subsection 1, of the Constitution has been too much obscured in the consideration by some courts of constitutional questions.

It is the opinion of this court that it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution that this clause, giving the right to levy taxes to pay the public debts, provide for the common defense and general welfare, was to be applied in times of emergency as a liberal and flexible means of providing for the welfare of the United States in times of disaster; provided, of course, that no other and restraining clause was violated.

It seems that some judges have overstressed the interstate-commerce clause and the due-process clause at the expense of the general-welfare clause. The due-process clause of the Constitution is not violated by the method in which the Secretary of Agriculture is instructed to calculate applicable taxes to each of the commodities affected by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Nor is there a lack of uniformity of taxation as required by article 1, section 8, subsection 1. Hogs in Iowa are taxed upon the same basis as hogs in Mississippi; wheat in Illinois upon the same basis as wheat in California; corn in Indiana upon the same basis as corn in Tennessee; and cotton, likewise, is uniformly treated in all of its producing States.

In the early days of this Republic the expenses of the common Government were borne by taxes upon liquor and tobacco. These taxes were not held to be discriminatory. Why, therefore, should taxes levied upon corn, cotton, hogs, and the commodities described in the Agricultural Adjustment Act be regarded as vicious? Protective import taxes—not primarily designed for revenue—were the means of protection of infant industries, and have been continued for the benefit of lusty, healthy, manufacturing enterprises. Why, then, the argument that the imposition of these farmer-benefit processing taxes is class legislation?

The Schechter case is not in point with the case under discussion for the reason that the Schechter case involved the regulation of local business within the State, and the unconstitutionality of the National Recovery Act did not involve any consideration of taxation.

The motion to dismiss the bill is sustained, and an appropriate order will be entered in conformity with this opinion.

JOHN D. MARTIN,
United States District Judge.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, whatever anyone may think, the time of the Senate and the country taken this morning in discussing the question before us has not been wasted. I have listened to the speech of the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I do not doubt at all the power of Congress to enact into law the bill the Senator has introduced, because, as he correctly pointed out, the inferior courts are the creations of Congress, and the only things Congress is restricted from doing are covered in the provision that it cannot reduce the salaries of judges and cannot remove them except by impeachment. Therefore, in my judgment, the bill is sound, and would stand a test of the courts.

The bill presented by the Senator provides:

> No district court or circuit court of appeals shall have jurisdiction of, and no district or circuit judge shall have jurisdiction or power to issue an injunction in, any suit in which it is sought to enjoin, suspend, or restrain the enforcement, operation, or execution of any act of Congress unless and until such act—

I submit for the consideration of the able Senator an amendment at that point, to insert the words "or some provision thereof." Otherwise the court might say, "We will issue an injunction because this act has never been declared unconstitutional", whereas if the words "or some provision thereof" were inserted, then the court could not escape in that way, for, as the able Senator pointed out in the document to which he referred, some 73 laws or parts of laws have been declared unconstitutional. The Senator did not say 73 laws, but, correctly, he said "laws or provisions thereof." We will find by consulting that document that very few laws, possibly 8 or 10 or 11, have been declared unconstitutional in their entirety. In some cases involving laws five or six pages long, one phrase, one sentence, one paragraph may be declared unconstitutional. Therefore I ask the able Senator to consider the insertion, after the word "act", of the words "or some provision thereof."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I regard the Senator's suggestion as a very high compliment to me. This morning I came to the very conclusion he has reached, and revised my bill, introducing another one so as to include the very language the Senator has suggested.

Mr. ASHURST. I always listen to the remarks of the able Senator on legal subjects with attention and respect.

Mr. President, I do not know that I should tax my strength this morning in discussing the asserted power of the Supreme Court of the United States to declare acts of Congress beyond the powers of Congress further than to say that in all tyrannical governments, no matter what may be their form, whether an oligarchy, or, as Thomas Jefferson said, 148 men—no monarch, no tyrant, makes any progress whatever unless and until he seizes in his hands the legislative, the executive, and the judicial powers. Monarchs in Europe—some may call them "tyrants"—would be effectively hampered in their efforts unless they held in one hand, in one magistracy, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial powers. So the first thing a wise, prudent, scheming, subtle monarch in Europe does if he wants complete control is to seize legislative, executive, and judicial powers.

An act of the British Parliament is supremely legislative, it is also supremely judicial. William the Conqueror, in his own hall, before the creation of Parliament, set up his curia regis, or aula regis, to make laws, and to declare laws unconstitutional, if he saw fit, at any time.

Coming down through the ages, the supreme legislative and the judicial powers have reposed in parliament. Parliament possesses the supreme legislative and supreme judicial power. That is their form; it has worked well with them. But when our ancestors formed a government they deemed it unwise to place the legislative and the judicial powers into the same magistracy. Therefore the separation of the powers.

Some Senators discussed the question of the right of the Supreme Court to declare certain laws beyond the power of Congress to enact. That is an interesting subject; and, in my judgment, there are Members of the Senate more able than I, at least at the present moment, to discuss that subject. Suffice it to say that when the Constitution was written, article 6 provided, among other things:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land.

Many lawyers contend that that provision gave to the Supreme Court the power to declare laws invalid if they contravened the Constitution. I should like, however, to indicate what, in my judgment, is an overwhelming reason why there must be some magistracy to determine when Congress exceeds its power.

Difficulty was encountered in having the Constitution ratified. The eloquence of Patrick Henry and the influence of the Livingstons and the Clintons and various other statesmen were so great that the Federal Constitution, after it was submitted in 1787, was not immediately ratified. Indeed, New York ratified by a majority of only three. Virginia, after one of the most illuminating debates in the history of our continent, was able to ratify the Federal Constitution by a majority of only 10, and only then by promising to the country that there would be immediately adopted a Bill of Rights setting forth and protecting the great privileges and immunities and franchises which accompany free men in all the Anglo-Saxon world.

So, with the promise made to the States and the statesmen of the country that there would at once be incorporated a bill of rights, as soon as the Congress passed a tariff bill to put some money into the Treasury, James Madison, a Member of the House of Representatives, rose, in 1789, and said:

> In compliance with the promise made to the country, I now introduce the Bill of Rights.

It was introduced and passed and became a part of our Constitution, being embodied as the first 10 amendments, and they were ratified within 2 years and a few months.

The 10 amendments safeguarded the great privileges, franchises, and immunities which are the heritage of freemen everywhere, and when these privileges and franchises and immunities of freemen were assured, Congress was denied the power to do certain things; indeed, many things which I shall not enumerate. Suppose Congress should attempt to overthrow these great rights, privileges, immunities, and franchises of citizens. In that event surely the Supreme Court would be bound to say, whether we liked it or not, "Such action is not according to the Constitution." Suppose Congress should say that a certain sect or a certain religion should be the state religion, and that all people should be punished who did not adhere to or worship in that faith. Surely my able friend, with his acumen and his judgment, if he were on the bench, would be bound under his oath to say, "Congress cannot do that."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does not catalog, but he refers to the provisions of the Bill of Rights putting it beyond the power of Congress to pass laws establishing religion, or abridging the freedom of speech or the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble. The Constitution provides that Congress shall not do those things. Suppose it should do one of them; where else could a citizen go except to a court?

Mr. ASHURST. Nowhere else.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the able Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Suppose some authority, well recognized and delegated to the Congress of the United States, were imbedded in an enactment which the people of the country desired, and the Supreme Court held it unconstitutional. Then where would the citizen go?

Mr. ASHURST. If it were contrary to the Constitution, the people would have to amend the Constitution.

Mr. MINTON. Such a thing happened in this country in the Legal Tender cases.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MINTON. Gentlemen hold up horrible examples of what may happen to the liberty of someone in this country if Congress does thus-and-so.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. MINTON. Suppose Congress, in pursuance of a well-recognized and constitutional right, enacts a statute, and the Supreme Court knocks it down—and many people think they do that—where can the citizen go?

Mr. ASHURST. Then the Constitution should be amended. We should go to the source of power.

I have no sympathy with attempts to whittle or to chisel, by indirection, circumlocution, and periphrasis, and "house-that-Jack-built" methods, in order to acquire power. Let us manfully stand up and say, "Mr. President, we ought to have more power. We need more power." The way to obtain it is by consulting the States. Acting upon that belief in good faith, I introduced an amendment proposing to give Congress the power—Senators, mark this, for it is sweeping—to regulate commerce, agriculture, industry, and labor. I believe Congress should have the right to regulate agriculture, commerce, industry, and labor; and when I have used those four words I have used about all the words that could describe an activity in our country.

My amendment, however, would not interfere with the privileges and franchises and rights of citizens set up in various amendments to the Constitution. It would not interfere with due process of law; it would not interfere with those rights of citizens, but would give Congress the power legally to enact each and every one of the 12 laws or provisions of laws which were lately declared by the Supreme Court to be beyond our power to enact.

I am not much given to vilification or abuse of another branch of Government when in our own hands is the power to do in the right way what we desire to do. If, forsooth, we have not the power to regulate labor as it ought to be regulated, let us seek the power legally—not, I repeat, by indirection, circumlocution, periphrasis, and "house-that-Jack-built" methods. With such methods I have not much sympathy. I have great sympathy with all wisely conceived reform measures which the country demands. The expansion of industry and science and our general progress require us to enter fields of legislation which would have been regarded as fantastic even 30 or 40 years ago.

In my judgment the way to reach the desired objective is by bold frankness, by asking the people of the States to ratify the necessary amendments. If we think the Supreme Court should not exercise the power of passing upon laws, let us say so by amendment. In the long run there will be niches in the hall of time, and places in the record of history, for men who act directly in that way; but there will be found no niches, no place in the record of history, nor will there be a glowing tribute on the page of any history for a Congress which by such methods as I have indicated tries to do indirectly that which it cannot do directly. Boldness, even as much as honesty itself, is admired by all men. If we do not have the power, let us ask for it, and let us not worry about such an amendment. The people will ratify. They are anxious to have a chance to ratify. They will not thank a Congress, they will not thank any administration, they will thank no one seeking to do things by indirection.

Mr. President, I have gone far beyond what I intended to say.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I do not mean to intrude myself at this point if the Senator does not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statements which have been made here, particularly to the statement that if we should proceed directly, openly, frankly, and bluntly to the accomplishment of a desired purpose, not the thwarting of a right or assumed right of the Supreme Court to declare an act unconstitutional, but boldly and frankly to declare to the people of the United States our intention to do something, our action would be ratified by the people. But when we are confronted with the fact that the Supreme Court, in the face of this express declaration of purpose, declares that we have not the right to do what we have done, a peculiar picture is presented to the people of the United States.

I recall so well the time when the income-tax amendment was adopted. Along with other citizens of the country, I discussed its terms. It provided that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived.

I have not yet been able to find a lawyer, at least not in my section of the country—and I have discussed this question with lawyers from the Atlantic to the Pacific—who has been able to find any justification for the apparently studied, cold, purposeful whittling away of the meaning of that expression in a number of decisions which, in my judgment, reflect no credit on the Supreme Court.

I raised this question once before, and I have refrained from criticizing the Supreme Court; but I submit to my brethren in the Senate that it is impossible to find, and I doubt if there is a man within the sound of my voice who can find, words more simple and more elementary than the words—

From whatever source derived.

Yet if the opinions of the Supreme Court on that point shall be examined, there will be found in them an indirection, a circumlocution and evasion which does no credit to that Court. I have heard lawyers in a justice court, a "dusty foot" court, make arguments infinitely more persuasive than the arguments advanced to persuade the court that that language did not mean what it said. The 125,000,000 Americans understood that language to mean that we were to tax income from whatever source derived. It is not a question of something that may have lurked in the mind of any legislator. The 125,000,000 people of the United States believe that the Congress was given the power to levy taxes on incomes from whatever source derived; and if any Member of this body can twist that language into the meaning that the Supreme Court gave it, he has a peculiar mentality.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Washington; and I wish to say that I was never more astounded, amazed, and surprised in my life than I was when the Supreme Court, in construing that amendment, said it did not give Congress the power to tax incomes derived from bonds of States and of the United States.

When I used to practice law, and lost a case, I would assemble my clients around me, go down to the hotel, and say, "Now, regarding that case of yours which I lost, the judges were wrong. You ought to have men like me on the bench, and your cases would be rightly decided." [Laughter.] In other words, I would go down to the village hotel and I would "cuss" the court, and I would tell those whom I was addressing how much more I knew about law than did the judges on the bench.

However, to abandon facetiousness, I say that I agree with the able Senator from the State of Washington. But, Mr. President, instead of going down to the hotel and abusing the courts, I promptly introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution which would give to Congress the power to tax the income or interest on bonds of States. I promptly introduced a proposed constitutional amendment which would give to Congress the power to levy taxes on income from bonds issued by the United States; and my amendment was about as popular as a cuckoo clock in a boy's dormitory. It received no support. In fact, I charge the able Senator on my left, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] with the defeat of my amendment. He was then a Member of another body, and presented his argument with an erudition and with an eloquence to which I listened with great respect, and later read with mute amazement and admiration. He is the one who destroyed my amendment; and if it had not been for his eloquent activities the Congress could now be levying taxes on income from bonds issued by the State of Texas.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask the Senator please not to interrupt the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Please do not charge against me any delay or dilatoriness in the matter of an amendment to levy taxes on income from bonds issued by the States or by the United States. I profoundly believe that the United States should have the power to tax bonds issued by States. I profoundly believe that the States should have power to levy taxes on bonds issued by the United States.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I gladly yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Did the Senator from Arizona introduce an amendment which sought to get around another opinion of the Supreme Court dealing with the same amendment that has just been discussed, in the case of Gore against Evans, which held that Federal judges' salaries were not subject to tax under that amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President. I have not time to pay attention to judges' salaries. I was interested, if the Senator will pardon me for saying so, in the larger question.

Mr. MINTON. I understand; but the Senator does not know how often he is going to be called upon to amend the amendment after the Supreme Court has spoken.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from Indiana for his suggestion. However, I do not wish to be led away from the subject. I think Congress will go further and will be more appreciated by the country if, whenever it needs power, it seeks to obtain it by the introduction and passage of an appropriate measure looking to the desired constitutional amendment. I think we have been altogether too lax, too slow, too hesitant about voting for such amendments. The greatest legislative and parliamentary defeat I ever sustained was when my own committee—the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman—declined to report the proposed amendment introduced by me giving Congress the power to tax the income from the bonds of States.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I do not wish to have the Senator from Arizona, whose argument is very entertaining and enlightening, misunderstand the purpose of my remarks a moment ago. I was not attempting to discuss the merits of a tax on public issues. I admit that there are two rather reasonable and very persuasive arguments on that subject, one on either side. If a public body has to have its bond issue taxed, or the revenue or interest from the bonds, obviously it will have to collect more taxes from its people, because the bonds cannot be sold at such good prices.

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. So there is an argument on both sides of that question. My whole purpose in bringing this subject to the attention of the Senate is not to discuss the merits of that question, but to point out that the Congress and the people of the United States, by the mechanism set up by the organic law of the land, did what they wanted to do in that respect. The legislature of my State voted for that amendment with the distinct understanding that Congress could tax these issues, whether or not it was good business to tax them; and the Supreme Court—nine men, or less than that number—said that 125,000,000 people had no right to do that. That is what the Court said by its decisions. There can be no escape from that argument. I have read those cases, and I should be unable to understand the meaning of the English language if I could reconcile the logic by which the Court invalidated that legislation.

Mr. ASHURST. Neither could I, Mr. President. When the decision was announced, I remember the able senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] criticized it—I will not say he ridiculed it—and went on to say that he would defy the "wordologists" of the country to find more nearly proper language than was used in the amendment. Is that not what the Senator said?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. I agree with that; but what is the use of quarreling about it? If we desire to tax the moneys derived as income from the bonds of the States, let us tax them. I am in favor of it. My own State does not agree with me; my own State does not think that Uncle Sam should tax the bonds issued by Arizona. I do not agree with my State, for I think there should be no tax-exempt property. Upon what reason and hypothesis has any man the right to have his safe-deposit vault or his vest pocket choked with securities and say, "I demand that you enforce the great amendments to the Constitution in my favor but I decline to make a contribution out of my money to be paid into the General Treasury." I have not yet despaired of having the Congress act favorably on my proposed amendment authorizing the United States to tax State bonds.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Arizona that most of the complaints that have been raised by Senators as against the Supreme Court have been based upon the theory that the Supreme Court in the case of property interests and other matters holds acts of Congress unconstitutional. Let me suggest that the Court has just as often, probably more often, denied the exercise of Federal power over the rights of individuals and also the power of the States.

A few days ago I was in the Supreme Court listening to some opinions being rendered. The legislature of the State adjoining that of the Senator from Washington, the State of Oregon, had not only passed a law on so-called syndicalism but a man had been arrested, tried, and convicted in that State—and I think sentenced to some 8 years in the penitentiary—because he attended a meeting, although he made no remarks that were traitorous or of an incendiary character. However, because it was shown that he belonged to some communistic or other organization and was present at a meeting he was not only tried and convicted under the State law but was on the road to the penitentiary for 8 years. The Supreme Court held that that act violated the fourteenth amendment in that it denied due process of law.

Now, do Senators mean to strike down the power of the Court to render a decision of that kind? Suppose that had been a Federal law, would not the Court have been required and would it not have been its duty to have stepped in and done the same thing?

Mr. ASHURST. In the first place, it is not to my liking to become the champion of any body of men. I am not the particular champion of the Supreme Court of the United States. They are able to take care of themselves; I feel no obligation here or elsewhere to defend them or anybody else, and what I say, I beg Senators to believe, is not because I am attempting to act as a wet nurse for any body of men; that is not my policy; that is not to my liking. I simply hold the views I am expressing.

I said our forefathers and ancestors desired to build a government where the legislative and judicial and executive power should not be in one magistracy. I think we may consider Thomas Jefferson as one of the soundest statesmen so far as the rights of the people are concerned whom we have ever produced. I have a letter of Jefferson here in which he said:

> We cannot give to the Congress the judicial power, for an oligarchy of 148 men is as bad as an oligarchy of 1.

Long before the Government of the United States was founded, colonial courts were declaring acts of the Colonies invalid. Let me read——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. ASHURST. I will ask the Senator first to let me read from an article written by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose learning is so well known and whose industry and research are recognized by all. The article was printed in the RECORD of January 6, 1936. Senator BORAH said:

> Years before John Marshall was born it was a settled doctrine in the Colonies that any legislative act of a colonial legislature must be held void if in conflict with the charter or fundamental law of the colony. It was a doctrine which grew up with our constitutional history. It was a doctrine which grew up with American law. Over 500 acts of colonial legislatures were held void under this principle.

I should like at this point, Mr. President, to have printed in the RECORD a brief extract from Thomas Jefferson's Notes on the State of Virginia, as quoted by Madison in The Federalist (Lodge edition, p. 48).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

All the powers of government—legislative, executive, and judiciary—result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the Republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason, that Convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these several powers. The judiciary and the executive members were left dependent on the legislative for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it. If, therefore, the Legislature assumes executive and judiciary powers, no opposition is likely to be made, nor, if made, can be effectual, because in that case they may put their proceedings into the form of acts of assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have accordingly, in many instances, decided rights which should have been left to judiciary controversy, and the direction of the Executive, during the whole time of their session, is becoming habitual and familiar.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator no doubt recalls that the great French writer Montesquieu declared that whenever the powers of the three branches of government—judicial, executive, and legislative—were reposed either in the same agency——

Mr. ASHURST. In the same magistracy.

Mr. CONNALLY. Or whenever they were not separated there was tyranny.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; but I have no fear of a tyrant in America; I do not think anybody fears a tyrant in America, because we are of such mold and cast that we will tolerate no tyrant of any kind. So nobody is afraid of one; and this is therefore more or less of an abstract discussion; but it is worthy of a note by students of history that no tyrant, no absolute ruler has ever made headway unless he had the executive and the legislative and the judicial powers in his hands. That was the reason for the action of the so-called "founding fathers", upon whom nowadays a good deal of ridicule is sometimes poured. It is true, perhaps, that they were deep-drinking, fox-hunting, wig-wearing men, but they acted according to the lights before them. They made many mistakes, but they each and all recognized the demands of progress and that they were laying down broad fundamentals for what might become the greatest nation in the mighty tide of time. They did the unusual. They not only provided for one method of amending the Constitution, but they did that which had never before been done in the history of the world: so anxious were they that posterity might not in any way be handcuffed, they provided two methods of amendment. Is it statesmanlike, is it sportsmanlike—and when I say sportsmanlike I mean that unless there is some sportsmanship in one he is not much of a statesman—with two methods of amendment before us, constantly to complain that we lack power, and then take no action looking to acquiring the power the lack of which we complain?

I apologize to the Senate for what is perhaps a rather broken and hesitant speech. As previously stated, I doubted my strength to discuss the question at this time, and I will ask unanimous consent, however presumptuous it may appear to be, to have printed in the RECORD at this point a speech I delivered here a year ago pointing out that Congress has no judicial powers except in impeachments and in the determination of the rights of its own Members to seats in the respective bodies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a number of persons, respectable in character, have complained against the exercise of the power of the Federal courts to declare acts passed by Congress unconstitutional. Some of the complainants take the position that since we derived our legal procedure from England, and that inasmuch as the English courts did not exercise the power to declare an act of Parliament void, it was, therefore, unprecedented and unauthorized for Federal courts in the United States to explore an act of Congress with a view of ascertaining if such act was within the power of the National Legislature.

It will be remembered that the colonial governments in America were grants from the King and were connected with England through the medium of the crown and not through Parliament. The colonial charters were in fact constitutions, and the words "our constitution" in the Declaration of Independence have particular reference to the colonial charters or grants. These charters differed somewhat as to the powers granted or denied, but they all appear to have contained the provision that local legislation enacted by the Colonies should not be contrary to the laws of England; hence the colonial laws were frequently tested by the charter or by the law of England, and many acts of colonial assemblages were annulled because they did not stand the test as to whether they were in accord with the constitution; that is to say, with the colonial charter—the grant. Thus the American colonists became familiar with that system and practice.

I now quote from an article written by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose learning as a lawyer is well known and whose industriousness in research is daily manifest, which article was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 6, 1936, as follows:

"Years before John Marshall was born it was a settled doctrine in the Colonies that any legislative act of a colonial legislature must be held void if in conflict with the charter or fundamental law of the Colony. It was a doctrine which grew up with our constitutional history. It was a doctrine which grew up with American law. Over 500 acts of colonial legislatures were held void under this principle."

I choose also to refer to the able address delivered before the Bar Association of the city of Charleston, W. Va., on January 25, 1936, by the Honorable John H. Hatcher, president of the Supreme Court of Appeals, State of West Virginia.

Moreover, I would direct attention to the address of the erudite junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] before the Virginia State Bar Association August 9, 1935, wherein he demonstrates that under the Constitution it is the duty of the courts to declare whether or not an act passed by Congress meets the test of the Constitution.

In tyrannical governments the supreme majesty, or the making, construing, and enforcing the law, is vested in one and the same man or one and the same body of men.

In a government where one and the same magistracy makes, construes, and enforces the laws, whether such magistracy be lodged in one man or in a body of men, there can be no public liberty.

It is true that English courts at the time of the formation of our Federal Constitution rescognized the absolute supremacy of acts of Parliament. Such recognition, however, did not flow from any suggestion of legislative immunity from review but flowed from the fact that Parliament acted in a double capacity—that is to say, as legislature and as court. Parliament possessed legislative and judicial power. Parliament was a court, the old curia regis or aula regis—a court established in England by William the Conqueror in his own hall—long before Parliament possessed the legislative power. In other words, when our Government was formed there were reposing in Parliament both legislative and judicial power; hence, an act of Parliament was both supremely legislative and supremely judicial.

In this connection it must be remembered that when our Federal Constitution was formed much care was taken to see to it that the three powers of government—to wit, the judicial, the executive, and the legislative—should be lodged in different magistracies—different officials—and that these powers should not be permitted to repose in or be exercised by one and the same magistracy.

The Constitution of the United States (art. II, sec. 1) says:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America"—

And (art. III, sec. 1) that—

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts"—

And so forth. Bear in mind that the executive power shall be vested in a President and the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and so forth, but the Constitution did not vest in the Congress all legislative power but only such powers as were granted and enumerated. The Constitution says that all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress (art. I, sec. 1).

Observe the scrupulous phrasing wherein executive power is granted to the President, judicial power to the Court, but that only such legislative power as is granted is lodged with the Congress; and this was done because the makers of the Constitution desired it to be crystal clear that the Federal Legislature was to be of limited power and that certain rights and powers of the States were not granted to the Federal Government but were reserved to the States. The States possess all the rights and powers not denied to them by the Federal Constitution, whereas Congress possesses only such power as was granted to it by the Federal Constitution.

Parliament was not a body of men with delegated, limited authority. It was a body of men supremely legislative and supremely judicial. The Congress of the United States is a body of men with delegated, limited authority, with no judicial power except as to impeachments and the qualifications of its own Members, and it is not even supremely legislative, as the States possess the powers that were not granted to the Congress. The belief that Congress possesses absolute and unlimited power is a devastating error into which many well-meaning persons have fallen.

The Constitution makers would have recoiled from the suggestion of granting to Congress the judicial power, and they would have recoiled with repugnance and alarm from the suggestion of granting to the judiciary the legislative power.

Some of the ablest lawyers, not only of our time but in bygone days, complained with not a little reason against judge-made law. The United States courts are and ought to be independent of the Army, independent of the Navy, independent of the Treasury, independent of patronage, independent of popularity, and must be content to remain so. Legislative power is the power to make laws. Judicial power is the power to declare laws. Executive power is the power to enforce laws.

The power to declare the law, of course, comprises the duty to determine what is the law and what is not the law. Article VI of the Constitution, among other things, says:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land * * *."

An act not made in pursuance of the Constitution is, of course, not a law. The judicial power may not make laws, but must declare, when its jurisdiction is invoked, whether an act of Congress is in pursuance of the Constitution; and if not made in pursuance of the Constitution, it is not a law.

A judicial review of acts of Congress is not an offshoot of English law, but is an American development arising from colonial practice out of a wholesome effort to keep separate the legislative power and the judicial power. It would be baleful to public liberty in our country for the legislative and the judicial powers to be centered in one and the same magistracy. Our genius of government is built upon the separation of the legislative, the executive, and the judicial power; and I doubt if, upon serious second thought, any enlightened friend to civil liberty will argue that these three powers should be centered in one and the same magistracy.

The legislative powers granted to Congress are enumerated and limited, and such limitation was not by chance, was not fortuitous, was not accidental, but was deliberate. Instead of seeking to acquire the judicial power, we in Congress would more truly serve our country by confining our operations to our legislative power.

It is true that our powers as Members of Congress are limited; but, nevertheless, if properly exercised, they are of sufficient amplitude and grandeur to give scope and opportunity to the most zealous champions of true progress and needful reforms, the most redoubtable defenders of liberty, the most eloquent tribunes of popular government, and to soothe and assuage the most fevered ambition.

There have been insinuations, unjustly indulged in, of course, that whilst seeking judicial power we have at the same time been abdicating some of our legislative powers. We would better first prove that we are faithful guardians of the power we now possess before we begin to try to acquire the judicial power.

In conclusion, Mr. President, if in this address I have been able to rectify any of the errors which either myself or others may have imbibed on this subject, my labors will not have been in vain.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in conclusion, I may say to the able Senator from Tennessee I agree with his bill. His address evidences considerable research, much to his credit, and if he will do the Senate Committee on the Judiciary the courtesy and favor of appearing before it, I see no reason why the bill should not, with reasonable dispatch, be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arizona a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask a question with respect to the bill submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, which provides:

No district court or circuit court of appeals shall have jurisdiction of, and no district or circuit judge shall have jurisdiction or power to issue an injunction in, any suit in which it is sought to enjoin, suspend, or restrain the enforcement, operation, or execution of any act of Congress—

Mr. McKELLAR. Or provision thereof.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes—

or provision thereof unless and until such act shall have been held finally invalid by the Supreme Court.

That is the legislation proposed. It is intended to prevent the operation of injunctive relief prior to a final adjudication by the Supreme Court of the United States? Does the Senator from Arizona so understand?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I understand that is the purpose of the measure.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. Injunctive relief is founded on the prevention of irreparable injury. Is it contended here that we shall enact a limitation upon any of the courts as to the rights of our constituents which will expose them to irreparable injury until they can reach the Supreme Court of the United States? Is that the proposition that is before the Senate and coolly debated here as a reasonable one?

Mr. ASHURST. In answer to that, let me say the able Senator has correctly horoscoped the purpose and effect of the proposed law. I do not doubt at all that Congress has power to do what is proposed. As the able Senator from Tennessee pointed out, in the initial portion of his remarks, the only constitutional court is the Supreme Court of the United States. The circuit, district, and other courts are so-called inferior courts. They are not creatures of the Constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator's argument, then, is that we can determine what is due process of law? Is it proposed to affirm that power in the Congress?

Mr. ASHURST. Injunction is an extraordinary legal remedy.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; and invoked to prevent irreparable injury.

Mr. ASHURST. Very true; but I still assert that, in my judgment, the Congress has power to pass this bill, and, if it should become a law, that the Supreme Court would not strike it down. I believe that whenever a man is elected to the United States Senate or as a Representative to the other House of Congress the first thing he does after he is elected or when he is contemplating election is to turn to the Constitution in order to ascertain what power he has. If one undertakes to act as attorney or as agent, the first thing he does is to read his power of attorney and see what are his powers. Sometimes able lawyers, Members of the Senate, such as those who sit around me, find that a reading of the Constitution itself does not always disclose just what their powers are. Our powers are set forth in the Constitution, and we have such additional powers as are necessarily implied from the powers granted. If I had been in the Chamber yesterday or the day before when the Senator from Arkansas so ably stated his position, while he needed no word from me or anyone else, I would have supported him. It is never unconstitutional to save the United States; it is never unconstitutional, in time of war, pestilence, floods, and other great disasters to do so.

The doctrine of ex necessitate rei, the doctrine of necessity, intervenes as well as the doctrine of humanity. Our own forefathers would laugh at us, if, indeed, they could laugh, if we should apply to the Constitution such narrow and restrictive meaning and construction as would prevent us from rushing to the relief and aid of the stricken people of our country.

Mr. President, I brought upon myself some delicious, in a way, and gentle raillery here by declaring that everybody knows, when the United States is assailed by a foreign army, it is constitutional to go to war and fight. In the insect world there are 450,000 different kinds of insects. It is a question whether mankind or the insects will inherit the food supply of the earth. Suppose that some tribal insects should, as they might, assail the food supplies of the United States. Who amongst us would say it would be unconstitutional to fight insects? We would bring on an army of gas squads and we would exterminate the insects in order to preserve the food supplies of the people.

Therefore, in all these great questions we look to the object to be accomplished. Some other branch or power of Government says we have not the power to take action. We have the power to say we will acquire the power. Therefore, while I do not wish to put myself forth and to be cataloged in opposition to the leading men of the administration, I make no apology here or elsewhere for the amendment to the Constitution which I introduced last year proposing to grant Congress certain powers. I am prepared to defend the amendment. I have not reintroduced it; I do not know that I shall again introduce it; but I take nothing back. If I want power I ask for it. I think that is the way we should proceed.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for permitting me to trespass so long upon its time and patience

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe perhaps the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] was not here when I read the opinion, or part of the opinion, of the court in the case involving a statute which Congress enacted in 1932 in connection with trade-dispute cases, requiring that before any injunction could be issued by a trial court or a district judge a certain kind of hearing should be held, evidence taken on five different subjects to satisfy the judge concerning those five different subjects and outlining the kind of evidence that should be taken and providing that no injunction should be granted until all those steps were taken. It provided with far more particularity the limitations to be placed upon the district judge. That act has been held by the Supreme Court to be constitutional.

In addition to that I have investigated the 73 acts which have been declared unconstitutional in whole or in part, or their unconstitutionality hinted at in the decisions of the Supreme Court, and I find that in only eight cases did the prayer of the bill ask for an injunction. I think only six were actually granted. In none of them, as the Senator will see if he will examine the synopsis of those cases made by Dr. Schulz, to which I referred in my remarks, was any irrevocable injury involved. It is difficult to conceive how that question could be involved.

Taken in connection with the bill of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], which I hope will be approved, except as to the injunction feature, taken in connection with his proposal to insure expeditious procedure, no real harm can be done any citizen. I think if the Senator from North Carolina will look at the authorities which I have cited in my remarks he will come to the conclusion that the bill is entirely constitutional.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I fear I did not make myself clear. I did not raise the question of the constitutionality of the proposed legislation, though I could raise it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I did misunderstand the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. A reference to the notes of the official reporter will show that I did not remotely suggest the unconstitutionality of the measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not necessary to make reference to the official reporters' notes. If the Senator makes the statement I accept it at its full face. I doubt if the Senator can think of a case where irrevocable injury would be done by the delay involved in issuing an injunction.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's reference to the due process clause of the Constitution gave rise to the thought that he did have in mind the possible unconstitutionality of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I will agree to that. It might have been raised by that suggestion. I am not complaining about that. I raised the question of the morality of it—not the constitutionality but the morality of it, and that strikes deeper than the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. First, let me ask whether the Senator thinks it was ever intended or suggested in any way in our Constitution that a district judge, known as an inferior judge by our Constitution, should have the right to declare unconstitutional any act of Congress?

Mr. BAILEY. I think so. I will answer in the affirmative. The judicial section of the Constitution vests the judicial power—and that is all the judicial power—in a Supreme Court and such other courts as the Congress may ordain. When we vested it we vested it all. We vested all the judicial power conceived of in the English-speaking civilization, and that was derived, of course, from the Roman civil law. There is none here except upon the trial of impeachment. We cannot take any either.

We may deprive the courts of jurisdiction, but we can never lay our hands upon the judicial power. It is vested. Who vested it? The American people. Who are we that we should undertake to take it away from them? Who are we that we should raise the question of the power of their court, which they created to restrain us when we lay unholy hands upon the judicial power?

I had not intended to go into that argument, but I am going into the question of the proposed legislation. I said I raised the question of the morality of the proposition, not the constitutionality. Let me paint a picture.

Down in North Carolina is some humble citizen upon whom the power of an unconstitutional act of Congress is laid. There have been such and there will be others. He goes to a court and lays before the court his petition, in which he says, "This purported act of Congress is doing or is about to do me an irreparable injury; an injury which cannot be repaired"; that is, it involves loss of life, or loss of liberty, or loss of property—and they are all combined in our great word "liberty."

The court finds that that is a fact. The citizen makes a good showing. The judge says, "Yes; you are suffering an irreparable injury, which it is beyond anybody's power to repair once it is done. You are about to suffer it or you are suffering it but I can do nothing for you. The judiciary is exhausted by an act of Congress which imposes the wrong upon it. You must go to the Supreme Court of the United States. You must employ lawyers to go there. It is a long distance, a great distance. You must bide the time of going. You cannot go when you wish to go. You must go when it is convenient for the Court, and the Court has much business."

The injury goes on. He suffers the wrong. He loses his property or he loses his life or he loses his liberty. The injury already has been held by a court of justice to be irreparable. There he stands. The only thing he has left is an appeal to the Court after the irreparable injury is done.

It is immoral, regardless of the constitutionality of it, which I shall argue another day. The morality of legislation is on the very threshold of things; the morality of public policy is involved.

A man comes in under some act of Congress, as it may appear, and takes possession of my property. That has been done. It makes no difference whether the owner of the property is rich or poor. I may say that he is a great, rich man, or he is a very poor man. The law makes no distinctions. Let it be assumed that he is a farmer on a farm. He goes into the court and says, "This man should get off my property. I am suffering irreparable injury. I am losing the rents and the profits. I am out of my home." The court says, "Yes; that is indeed very true, but you have no remedy this side of the Supreme Court of the United States", situated at Washington, and sitting, I should say, 7 or 8 months in the year.

The remedy of injunction is always in the breast of the court. It is not necessary that the judge should be sitting in his term. Wherever you find the judge, there is your relief.

I was rather glad that it was conceded earlier in the debate that it was not to be proposed to take away the writ of habeas corpus. That, at least, will stand; but I will make the point that we might just as well take that step as to take away my right to injunctive relief against a lawless act; and an unconstitutional act is a lawless act. I must have some way to prevent the doing of irreparable injury to me; otherwise there is no life, and there is no liberty, and there is no property.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say about the subject at this time. If this bill ever comes back here, I desire to be heard, and with all earnestness.

I wish to respond also to the statement made by one of the Senators, in our very pleasant and informal discussion, that he would have to believe that anybody who differed with him on the subject of the Court's position in construing the income-tax amendment had a twisted mind.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I did not say that.

Mr. BAILEY. No; the Senator from Arizona did not say it. The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] said it. I suppose our minds are always twisted when we differ with our fellow men. Very well. I will take the risk and invite the thunder.

In construing that amendment, the Supreme Court of the United States made it perfectly clear why it construed the amendment so as not to authorize the taxing of income on the bonds of States and political subdivisions. It took the view that the people in adopting that amendment, and the States in giving that power, did not intend to give the power to destroy the States. The power to tax is the power to destroy. My State of North Carolina issues bonds. I think it has bonds outstanding today in the sum of $160,000,000. I think we are selling them on the market bearing interest at the rate of about 2.75 percent. If it be admitted that the Federal Government may tax the income from those bonds, then my State is put in the position of paying 3, 3¼, or 4 percent, all being determined by the rate imposed; and as we get into the higher brackets of the income-tax law the rate becomes very high.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. In just one moment. The consequence of that would be to destroy the credit of the State of North Carolina. The illustration may be used with respect to other States, with respect to counties and towns and cities. It may be used with respect to bonds of the United States Government.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield in one minute. I merely wish to make the conclusion.

The Supreme Court simply held that one phrase in an amendment to the Constitution was not the Constitution. There is nothing twisted about that. The phrase in the amendment is governed by the Constitution as a whole, just as every other phrase in the Constitution is governed by all the remainder of the Constitution. It is perfectly logical, perfectly consistent, and thoroughly in accord with the traditions and the character of the great Republic, made up, as it is, not of one nation but of a combination, a confederation, a union of 48 different States. The conception was very simple that in ratifying that amendment they did not intend to destroy themselves. I think that conclusion did not come from twisted minds, and I should think that even a twisted mind would not have difficulty in seeing its force.

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina was pointing out the desire of Senators to tax the income from State bonds.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I was not talking about the desire.

Mr. CONNALLY. The proposal, then.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I was talking about this amendment, interpreting it in the light of the character of the country, and trying to give the reasons assigned by the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONNALLY. As a matter of fact, we now have the power to tax the income from Federal bonds. We cannot tax the income from State bonds. Senators will not even do that, however. They ought to be consistent. We do not tax the income from Federal bonds except as to surtax, and we really had better not do that, because we should get money much more cheaply if we did not even levy the surtax on such income. But Senators do not tax even the income from Federal bonds, and yet some of them wish to tax State bonds, which would destroy State credit, and cost the States at least 1 percent additional interest rate on every dollar that they pay from now until kingdom come. It is not consistent, and it is not sound.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should be indifferent on the matter of the Federal Government's taxing the income upon its own bonds.

Mr. CONNALLY. They do not do it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Government would just pay the tax. That is all it would amount to. We should pay it when we sold our bonds.

Mr. CONNALLY. We should pay twice as much.

Mr. BAILEY. But I am here saying that the decision of the Supreme Court in construing the income-tax amendment was founded upon a profound appreciation of the character and the structure of the Government, and they could not have done otherwise; and there is nothing illogical about it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to repeat, perhaps at the risk of being a bit tedious—and I thought I made it very plain when I occupied the floor—that I was not discussing the merits of the proposal to tax public issues. I have had some little experience in the preparation of resolutions dealing with the utterance and issuance of public securities. I have some question in my own mind, and I have two or three times expressed that thought on this floor, as to the wisdom of taxing public issues. We seem to have made an argument out of something which was not argued here, now or at any time. Certainly, however, I do not think anyone could have assumed for a moment that my argument here, or my remarks on the floor, were an argument for taxing public issues. I had not so intended them. I realize that if we tax a public security, we must make the people who pay that public security pay the difference in the price that the bond will bring and the interest over the years. That is elemental. Children understand that simple thing.

Nor did I intimate, as the Senator has suggested, that his mind or the mind of any other person was twisted because he did not think the word "whatever" meant what the Supreme Court said it meant. I simply said, and I desire to repeat it for the benefit of the Senator from North Carolina, that I do not believe that by any process of logic or by any rule of grammar the words "from whatever source derived" can be made to mean what the Supreme Court said they meant.

Perhaps the words "from whatever source derived" are not the whole Constitution; but I am saying that the Supreme Court, consciously or otherwise, has done itself a great wrong and a great disservice, because all over the United States at the time that amendment was adopted, regardless of the merits of taxing public issues, it was the well-ordered opinion of the great bulk of the legislators who voted for it that the amendment authorized the taxing of all public issues.

That is the point here, not whether or not somebody had a twisted mind. I think, however, that the Supreme Court warped and twisted the plain meaning of simple English words in doing that; and I raised the question solely because the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has proposed a constitutional amendment on the subject. If that amendment should be subjected to the same form of interpretive reasoning, then the purpose of the Senator from Arizona and the purpose of all the legislatures that voted for it would be nullified. It would just be blotted right out if that sort of reasoning were employed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I simply desire to make one correction in a statement of fact. The Senator stated that it was the universal understanding when the amendment was ratified that it would permit the taxing of State securities.

Mr. BONE. Perhaps I had better modify that statement and say that it was my understanding.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say to the Senator that he has taken in a great deal of territory. There was no understanding of that sort in my section of the country. I can speak for North Carolina. We ratified the amendment and we gave the Federal Government an immense power, too.

Mr. BONE. I fully agree with the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I sometimes wish North Carolina could get back that power; but it is gone. I am saying, however, that when we ratified the amendment it did not enter the mind of anybody in North Carolina that we were giving the Federal Government the power to tax our public securities and therefore destroy the credit of the State. If that question had been presented, the State of North Carolina never would have ratified the amendment.

Mr. BONE. I think perhaps the Senator indulges in what he might, on more mature consideration, consider a little exaggeration when he says nobody in the State of North Carolina believed that, for I know it was the opinion of the people through the West, expressed in innumerable newspaper articles, expressed in debate on the floor of the Legislature of the State of Washington, that the amendment conferred on Congress the power to tax all the issues of the States.

Of course, we need not argue the question of whether or not it is wise to do it. I think perhaps we do ourselves a disservice in permitting that sort of question to come into this kind of an argument. The point is that the Court took the simple phrase, "from whatever source derived", and warped and twisted it by reasoning which I think cannot be sustained in logic.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I do not feel content to sit quiet and have any Senator speak of the Supreme Court as "warping and twisting" the Constitution. I do not know that I have any right to do more than protest; but it is strange language.

Mr. BONE. I content myself by saying that I am in most happy company with Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and a great number of other men I could name of attainments far beyond those which I will ever realize, who have said things compared with which my statements are as moonlight unto sunlight, or water unto wine. I have merely commented on a little phrase of three or four words, "from whatever source derived", and I think the opinion of the 125,000,000 people of the United States will probably in the main be with me in thinking that those words mean what they say or do not mean what they say. If we were to consider a constitutional amendment of any kind which the present administration or any administration would sponsor for the purpose of helping us solve some of the present tragic economic problems, and we employed the simplest words in the English language, and the logicians and the college professors and the Jovian-browed gentlemen from universities were called in to interpret the expression, the Members of the Senate could have no assurance whatever that that expression would not be interpreted to mean exactly the opposite of what we intended it to mean.

To call attention to this matter has been the sole purpose of my remarks, and if the Senator from North Carolina thinks I have criticized the Supreme Court, I urge him to read what Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson and Jackson had to say about decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. MINTON. I might add, if the Senator from Washington please, the Senator from North Carolina might read some of the dissenting opinions of Justices of the Supreme Court itself, if he wishes to know what criticism of the Supreme Court is.

Mr. BONE. Yes; Justice Harlan, probably, for one.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I have no intention of detaining the Senate longer than a minute, and I take this occasion to speak at all only because of the fact that we were startled by the eloquence of the Senator from North Carolina. He rushes to the defense of the Supreme Court, and rightly so; he would have no one make a charge against the Supreme Court that is not justified; and that is commendable. At the same time, I think we might rise here to challenge the statement of the Senator from North Carolina when he says that if the measure under consideration at the present time were enacted into law it would be the commission of an immoral act.

I think the Senator does too much honor to the distinguished men who occupy the bench of the district courts of the United States when he envisions a period when the Congress of the United States has become so depraved that in a high-handed and roughshod manner it will ride over the constitutional rights of the people of this country and embody its action in a statute, and that the people's liberties depend solely upon some judge on the bench of a district court out in some State of the United States who possesses the morality to strike down such a law.

I do not believe the morality of this country is divided up in any such fashion, and I am of opinion that whenever the Congress of the United States solemnly passes an act, when a measure musters enough votes to get by the Congress of the United States, the morality of the act has been carefully considered by the Congress of the United States, and I believe that the liberties of the people of this country will not be jeopardized or the morality of anyone affected if we take the act of Congress and carefully consider it, rather than search for morality in the district courts of the United States. I say this in no unkind spirit toward the courts of the country; I say it in defense of the powers, the prerogatives, and the duty of the Congress of the United States.

We seek no unseemly contest with any other branch of government. We merely seek to pursue in our own way what we conceive to be our own constitutional right. Throughout the long history of this country, and the exercise of the power by the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, I challenge any man to point to any opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States and say that but for that opinion the Congress of the United States would have ridden roughshod over the people of this country and jeopardized their liberties and their rights.

So I rise on this occasion in defense of the Congress of the United States and the exercise of its power and authority, for throughout 150 years of our history Congress has exercised that power some 40,000 times, and only about 74 times has the Supreme Court of the United States set aside an act of Congress.

It may be said that is a good record for the Supreme Court. Yes; it is; and I assert that it is a good record for the Congress. So only in that spirit would I defend the morality of the Congress of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless our Father and our God for the inspiration of every permanent movement that enriches human life. We pray Thee that we may hallow Thy name in all our intercourse with our fellow men; let the law and the prophets be fulfilled in us. Cleanse our hearts from all secret faults; direct our thoughts and impulses and keep them in conformity to the high conceptions of truth and justice. Heavenly Father, in all the complicated problems that may arise help us to quit ourselves as God-fearing men. We pray that the dominant temper of the Congress may be couched in the precious fruits of the spirit—gentleness and patience, joy and love. In the blessed name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 3. Concurrent resolution to authorize the printing of additional copies of the Revenue Act of 1936.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, I wonder if the gentleman will not defer that request, as Monday is unanimous-consent day.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I will make it Tuesday.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wish the gentleman would consult with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I will make it Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on next Wednesday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, he may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

THE CENTENNIAL OF MICHIGAN

Mr. O'BRIEN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the centennial of the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ALCOHOLIC REVENUE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the Budget estimate of $643,700,000 in revenue on alcoholic beverages for the fiscal year 1938 should draw attention to the enormous tax burden which this industry now supports. This huge tax load indicates that the population of our country has grown, that the alcoholic beverage industry has grown, and that the taxes have grown.

I feel certain that it would be of interest to the Congress and the country to see how far we have come since 1791 in the matter of taxation on spirituous liquors, and to that end I ask unanimous consent to submit a condensed history of this form of taxation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

1. The effective date of the first revenue act imposing a tax on the manufacture of spirituous liquors was July 1, 1791 (act of Mar. 3, 1791, 1 Stat. 202, sec. 14; 203, sec. 15).

2. Sections 14 and 15 of said act of March 3, 1791, provided for a sliding-scale tax of from 11 to 30 cents on spirits distilled from foreign materials and from 9 to 25 cents on spirits distilled from articles produced within the United States.

(The provisions of this act remained in force until the act of May 8, 1792, listed below.)

3. The dates of changes of the tax rate and various amounts up to and including the last tax, which raised the tax to $2 per gallon, are as follows:

Act of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 267, c. 32), effective July 1, 1792: According to the class of proof, on spirits distilled from foreign materials, from 10 to 25 cents per proof gallon, and from materials in the United States, from 7 to 18 cents per proof gallon.

Act of December 21, 1814 (3 Stat. 152, c. 15), effective February 1, 1815, 20 cents per gallon on spirits distilled within the United States, whether from foreign or domestic materials.

(Repealed, effective July 1, 1817, by act of Apr. 19, 1816 (3 Stat. 291), which provided in lieu thereof a tax on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors.)

Act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 447, sec 41), effective August 1, 1862, 20 cents per first proof gallon.

Act of March 7, 1864 (13 Stat. 14, c. 20), effective upon date of passage, 60 cents per proof gallon.

Act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 243, sec. 55), between July 1, 1864, and February (later amended to January) 1, 1865, a tax of $1.50 per proof gallon; after January 1, 1865, a tax of $2 per proof gallon.

Act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 157, sec. 32), continued same rate of tax per proof gallon as provided by act of June 30, 1864.

Act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 480, sec. 14), continued same rate of tax per proof gallon as provided by act of July 13, 1866.

Act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 125 effective 60 days, or longer if found necessary by Secretary of the Treasury), from date of passage (p. 167, sec. 108), 50 cents per proof gallon.

Act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 238, sec. 12), effective August 1, 1872, 70 cents per proof gallon.

Act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 339, c. 127), effective upon date of passage, 90 cents per proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof.

Act of February 24, 1919 (40 Stat. 1105, sec. 600), effective day following its passage, $2.20 per proof gallon or wine gallon when below proof.

Act of February 26, 1926 (44 Stat. 104), effective upon date of enactment, until January 1, 1927, $2.20 per proof gallon or wine gallon below proof, and proportionate at like rate on fractional parts; on and after January 1, 1927, until January 1, 1928, $1.65 per proof gallon or wine gallon, etc.; on and after January 1, 1928, $1.10 per proof gallon or wine gallon, etc.

Act of January 11, 1934 (48 Stat. 313), effective on day following date of enactment, on and after January 1, 1928, until January 12, 1934, $1.10 per proof gallon or wine gallon below proof and proportionate at like rate on fractional parts; on and after January 12, 1934, $2 per proof gallon or wine gallon, etc.

4. The effective dates of the provisions imposing taxes (per gallon) on the rectifying of liquors are as follows:

July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 150, sec. 59; act of same date), "Rectifiers of distilled spirits, rectifying, purifying, or refining 200 barrels or less of distilled spirits, counting 40 gallons of proof spirits to the barrel within the year, shall each pay $200 and shall pay 50 cents for each such barrel produced in excess of 200 barrels."

August 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 244; act of June 6, 1872), repeal of that part of act of July 20, 1868, which imposes "tax on rectifiers of 50 cents on each barrel produced in excess of 200 barrels."

March 1, 1879 (20 Stat. 333, sec. 4, act of same date), amends act of July 20, 1868, by adding proviso, "That any person who rectifies, purifies, refines, or manufactures as aforesaid less than 500 barrels a year, counting 40 gallons of proof spirits to the barrel, shall pay $100."

Mr. DIRKSEN. In getting a true picture of the contribution which the alcoholic-beverage industry now makes toward the upkeep and operation of Government, it could be pointed out that the revenues from alcoholic beverages for this fiscal year are estimated at $643,700,000, whereas the annual appropriation estimate for the entire Veterans' Administration, including hospital and domiciliary services, military and naval insurance, administration costs, together with pensions for veterans and dependents as far back as the War of 1812, amounts to $585,832,000. In other words, the taxes derived from the alcoholic-beverage industry annually is enough to defray the annual cost of the Veterans' Administration, with $58,000,000 left over to apply on other expenses of Government.

ELECTION TO A STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

There was no objection.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ADMISSION OF KANSAS TO STATEHOOD

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a short time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that January 29 is the seventy-sixth anniversary of the wonderful State of Kansas, I feel that a few remarks regarding this Commonwealth will not be out of order.

In years gone by much has been said on the floor of the House concerning Kansas as one of the leading agricultural States of the Nation, her industries, her natural resources, her educational advantages, and so forth; so I will touch on these briefly, devoting the short time allotted me to other matters.

In the last 400 years many different peoples, varying in race, language, customs, and religion, have laid claim to Kansas. First came the grass-house and earth-house dwellers; then the tepee dwellers, whose homes were cone-shaped leather tents. These were followed by the emigrant Indians from the eastern section of the country; then the Spanish horsemen, who laid claim to the vast plains and prairies for their king. French trappers and traders followed the Spaniard; and finally came the American farmer, who has built a State that all point to with a great degree of pride.

There is so much to be said on behalf of Kansas that one experiences difficulty in starting; but as we have studied and watched the development of our State we come to the conclusion that it is to our citizenship that we owe all, and with this in mind we pay tribute to the pioneer and those who followed. In the matter of education our people had a desire for schools far beyond that displayed in many frontier States. In some States the early settlers were content to let their children grow to maturity without educational advantages, but not so with the Kansas settlers.

They were quick to build schoolhouses and maintain them, even during the wars with the border ruffians, the Indians, and the Confederates. Many have said that the ideals of the Kansas people differ from those of other States, and refer to her as the State of individuality. The Kansas spirit, to which poets and orators have often referred, was born with the pioneers who came to Kansas in the name of liberty and bitterly opposed to slavery. The one who knows our State only by reputation would meet with many surprises if he were to travel across it today. Instead of finding people living in two-room shacks and running around with their feet wrapped in newspapers, as another has said, he would find a most contented citizenship living in comfortable and well-kept homes. He would marvel at the splendid churches and schools, often finding that the schoolhouse is the best building in the town and that the church spire has become a feature of almost every landscape.

In making this trip he would travel entirely over concrete and oil-surfaced roads. Kansas is truly "the main street of America", traversed by more Federal highways than any other State, with the exception of Texas, the largest State in the Union. To give you an idea of the tremendous extent of the Kansas State highway system, let me say that it is almost 3,180 miles from New York to San Francisco and a little more than 1,600 miles from the Canadian line to the Gulf of Mexico. Well, if all Kansas State highways were placed in a line, a person could make a trip from New York to San Francisco by one route, return by way of another, then start from Canada and go to the Gulf of Mexico by one route and return by a different one, and still have enough Kansas State highways left over to go once across our State east and west, the long way.

It will, no doubt, be surprising to some of you to learn that Kansas is both the geographic center of the Nation—Smith County—and the geodetic capital of the North American Continent—Osborne County.

Kansas leads the Nation in flour milling and ranks fourth in the meat-packing industry. There are 101 flour mills in operation in Kansas, or 10 percent of the total mills of the United States. Kansas City ranks first as a milling center, while Salina, which is located in my own congressional district, is the second most important milling city in the State and is sixth in the Nation in this regard. Our State has long been regarded as one of the leading livestock-producing and meat-packing centers of the Nation, and is now surpassed by only three other States.

There is enough salt underlying Kansas to last the United States for the next 250,000 years at the present rate of consumption, and it ranks third among the States in salt production.

The expansion of the oil industry in Kansas has been rapid, and it now ranks fourth in the production of oil. In 1935 we produced approximately 55,000,000 barrels of crude oil, and this in the face of governmental curtailment of production. During the month of February last Kansas produced less than one-seventh of its capacity of existing wells. New oil-producing territory is being discovered in the western half of the State.

There are over 25,000 retail establishments in Kansas, and I am happy to say that 90 percent of them are home owned.

Kansas is fourth in agriculture, with a well-balanced output, 47.1 percent of the farm income coming from crops and 52.9 percent from livestock products. It is the largest producer of Hard Winter wheat in the world and is the largest wheat-producing State in the Union. According to Federal statistics, we planted 16,000,000 acres of wheat last fall, or one-sixth of the wheat area of the Nation. To take care of this crop it has created the largest wheat storage capacity of any of the States. The largest grain elevator in the United States is located in Kansas City, Kans.

To give you an idea of the progressiveness of our people, let me say that Kansas has more farm-owned automobiles than 45 other States, more tractors than 46 others, more farm homes equipped with gas and electricity than 39 others, while 81 percent of the farm homes enjoy the convenience of a telephone.

One could go on and on telling of the wonderful advantages and opportunities to be found in this great State, but suffice it to say that today Kansas looks back upon 400 years of recorded history unmatched in color, significance, and appeal. Proud of its heritage, mindful of its traditions, Kansas faces the future with a confidence born of its vast natural resources. It offers the challenge of opportunity—opportunity that is limited only by the State's golden horizons. [Applause.]

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

WILLIAM M'KINLEY

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I have asked for this time today that I may discuss with you and that we might think together of the life and character of a man who, I think, was the greatest Congressman who ever was honored with an opportunity to serve in this, the greatest legislative body in the world. I refer to William McKinley, who was born in Ohio 94 years ago today.

PEOPLE HAVE CHOSEN WELL

The history of any country is read in the biographies of her great men and women. No country has ever been great except that it has produced great men. Great men make history, and history records their greatness. The governments of all ages have been greatly impressed by the lives and actions of their rulers. As these rulers were able or failed to interpret the aspirations of their people, their governments rose or fell. The impressions that men in national power and authority make on their people is of great importance. In our country we can boast that without exception, not one of those that we have elected to occupy the position of Chief Executive has ever been accused of disloyalty to our Government or our people. This is a great compliment to our experiment in democracy. This is more significant yet, when we consider that our Presidents have been drawn from all walks of life and from all strata of society. We have tested the strength of our democracy by calling to the Presidency men of varying ages, varying temperaments, varying backgrounds and qualifications, varying political affiliations, and varying social and financial standing.

COMMON PEOPLE

In America we hear much of "the great average citizen." Those who are able to provide their children with proper food, clothing, and with reasonable educational advantages. In America we can be proud of the high purpose of most of our wealthy men and we can be proud of the efforts of most of our very poor in their ambitions to advance. But the backbone of our democracy has been and always will be found in that great body of our people known as common people, who can make their own way in times of peace and who are ready to report in the full strength of their great numbers in time of war. Probably none of our many great Presidents and national figures more nearly represent this great class than does McKinley.

BIRTH AND CONSTANCY OF PURPOSE

William McKinley was born at Niles, Ohio, on January 29, 1843. This is the ninety-fourth anniversary of his birth. He was born into a home where there was no wealth except a wealth of love and a wealth of Christian character, industry, good citizenship, and patriotism. His life from the beginning was conspicuous for one thing, and in that respect he was as conspicuous as was Washington for his high character, and Jefferson for his learning, Lincoln for his humanity, and Theodore Roosevelt for his energy, and that one characteristic was his constancy in doing the right thing and his freedom from doing the wrong thing. His life from childhood to the highest place in the gift of a grateful people and even to his assassination was a constant procession upward. A fine boy, a purposeful youth, a gallant soldier, a profound lawyer, a great statesman, a good Governor, a wise President, a Christian martyr. While none should be compared to the Savior, yet, under our philosophy of life all should seek to be like Him. McKinley in his assassination was Christlike in that he gave his life for others and his solicitude was for his dearest relative, and in that he could say, "Let no one harm him."

CLEAN, HONORABLE PRIVATE LIFE

The private life of McKinley was so strikingly beautiful as it applied to his treatment of his invalid wife. All of his biographies mention this fact, for it carries such an encouragement to those who yet believe in the institution of home and family and their mutual obligations. One of many incidents of Mr. McKinley's devotion to his wife is commemorated by the erection of a beautiful monument and statue on the spot where it was so beautifully exemplified. When McKinley was Governor of Ohio he and his wife lived at the Neil House, a famous hotel situated across from the statehouse and in view of the Governor's office. Every day as he would walk from his hotel to his office he would stop on the opposite side of the street to wave at his invalid wife, who was always at the window. In commemoration of this beautiful and constant incident, the people of Ohio, when they erected a memorial monument to McKinley caused it to be erected on this spot across from the front of the hotel. This story, beautiful in its romance, is sweet in its simplicity, and encouraging in its appeal for fidelity, and strong in its recommendation of character. There is another incident in McKinley's private life which caused him great anguish and provided an opportunity for bringing out his splendid character as it applied to his private financial obligations. When he was Governor of Ohio a man in whom he had had the greatest confidence from his early life was forced into financial liquidation. Mr. McKinley had endorsed for this man what he thought was about to the extent of $15,000. But the endorsements had been misused until it appeared his endorsements would reach the sum of $90,000. This would take all the joint property of both Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and more, too. He courageously set about meeting these obligations by surrendering all they had and executing promissory notes for the remainder, which he promised to pay by leaving politics and returning to the practice of law, where he thought he could liquidate his debts. Strong friends came to his rescue and assumed to pay this debt and took an assignment of his property which they worked out later to the credit and satisfaction of Mr. McKinley. Except for the efforts of these friends, politics would have been robbed of a great statesman and the Nation would have been robbed of another great President. Verily the vicissitudes of politics are harrowing, and disaster and fortune often walk close together in the life of a public man.

SOLDIER

When just past 18 he enlisted in the Ohio Volunteer Infantry. His resolution to do this was early made, for he had watched the national events leading up to the Civil War with great interest. His love for the Union was such a part of him that he felt that duty called him, and his response was prompt. In his regiment were Stanley Matthews, who afterward became a Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and Rutherford B. Hayes, both of whom achieved great distinction as soldiers in the Civil War. In those days deeds of courage and valor were done every day on the field of battle, and in a thousand different ways. They were so general as to become commonplace. But in this great show of heroism on every hand there were unusual men. McKinley, by his ability and quiet, forceful conduct, immediately impressed his comrades and superiors with his soldierly qualities. He came out of the Army after rendering 4 years of hard, conspicuous service without any loss of time for sickness or injuries. For heroic conduct in the heat of many fierce conflicts at Antietam, in West Virginia, and in the Shenandoah with Sheridan, he earned his gradual promotions. On April 13, 1865, when Grant and Sheridan were gradually closing in on Lee, and Sherman was marching to the sea, McKinley "for gallant and meritorious service" upon the recommendation of Generals Sheridan and Crook was by President Lincoln made a major of Volunteers. This title won by him when a lad of 22, after 4 years under the pack, behind the musket, and in the saddle, through hardship and bloodshed was the one title of which he was genuinely proud.

GREATEST WORK WAS AS A CONGRESSMAN

McKinley's greatest work was not his work as Governor of Ohio, or as President of these United States. These great honors were bestowed upon him by our people because of his other great achievements. The hand of the impartial historian will, in the fullness of time when he writes of the life of this great man, say that his greatest contribution to the welfare of this great Republic was his service in the fierce struggle to save the Union and his work here in this room in his efforts to protect the laborers, the farmers, and the industries of this country from the destructive results of the cheap labor of the world. Countless millions have been added to the growth of this Republic as a result of the policies of protection adopted by our country through the leadership and statesmanship of this great man when he worked and labored here on this floor as the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Growth and development of his own country was the passion of his life. To him a protective tariff was the means by which this could best be brought about. While the protective tariff has generally been considered as a Republican doctrine, there are many instances where it has been espoused forcefully by some of the leading Democrats in times gone by. In these modern days there are very few statesmen who still believe in the doctrine of free trade. They all favor protection for the industries and products of their own section at least. Practically speaking, the protective tariff has quite frequently been a question of geography.

Immediately after the close of the Revolution when the States were operating under the Articles of Confederation, tariffs were levied by practically all the States against goods coming from the other States. Their conduct proved the old adage that "Self-preservation is the first law of nature." This caused much bitterness among the States. On the second day after the opening of the First Congress, which opened on April 6, 1789, James Madison, the father of the Constitution, offered a resolution providing for a protective tariff. The Constitution had been adopted and by its provisions States were prohibited from levying duties. Madison's idea was to control the importation of goods from foreign countries by a levy of an ad-valorem duty of 5 percent on all importations with specific duties on such articles as wines, coffee, and sugar. The debate on this bill lasted 6 weeks. It was in this debate that the phrase "infant industries" was first used. The bill was passed. It provided a specific duty on 36 different articles such as cotton, yarn, steel, nails, salt, and coal, and an ad-valorem duty on many other articles such as carriages, glass, and iron castings, the percentage of ad-valorem duty varying. You will note that the bill carried a protective duty on cotton. This bill passed by a vote of 5 to 1. James Madison, who is proudly claimed by the Democrats as a member of Jefferson's political family voted for the first tariff bill. George Washington, as President, approved and signed the bill. It is therefore very evident from the beginning that this great doctrine had a permanent place in the economic life of the Nation. Soon after the passage of the first tariff bill, Alexander Hamilton, whose genius as an economist and financier has not been surpassed by anyone since his day, published his "Report on Manufacturers." This report charted the course for the development of this great Nation. This report was truly a declaration of independence for industry, agriculture, commerce, and for men with rugged individuality and courage. It advocated policies that would guarantee protection to those who would venture their lives and fortunes in carrying westward and southward the flag of development. Under these policies the Nation has become the greatest financial and commercial nation of all times.

WAR OF 1812 AND TARIFF

During the war between England and France in 1808, England sought to prevent shipments of goods from America to France. This brought on our war of 1812. During the war America was thrown upon its own resources, and in this era our manufactures increased rapidly by force of necessity. As soon as the war ceased England sought to regain her hold on American commerce and proceeded to ship great cargoes to America for disposal at a very low price. This situation brought the protective-tariff doctrine forward as an instrument of self-defense. Because of a lack of leadership and experience the American Congress was unable to get a grip on the situation until 1816, when a tariff law was passed. This bill was not strict enough and was not scientifically drawn. The discussions and passage of this bill brought out strange situations from a political standpoint. Henry Clay, who was a Protectionist, opposed it, because it reduced the revenues. John C. Calhoun was its strong supporter because it protected cotton. It will probably shock Mr. TREADWAY and the Massachusetts delegation, both Republicans and Democrats, to know that Daniel Webster opposed it, not because it was not high enough, but because he thought that, since Massachusetts was engaged largely in shipping, it would be better for Massachusetts if it could keep its seamen busy transporting the cheap European goods to the other sections of America. Many students of the political and economic growth of America think that if the statesmen of that day could have anticipated as accurately as Hamilton had done, the growth and development of this country, a protective-tariff system, fair to all sections, could have been adopted which would have prevented the many bitter controversies that followed with reference to this subject.

The act of 1816 was not satisfactory, for it did not protect the manufacturing interests and neither did it stabilize the cotton and woolen interests. With the ascendancy of Clay to the Speakership of the House, he advocated what he called the "American system", which was modeled somewhat after the Hamilton system. He appointed a Committee of Manufactures to prepare a general tariff measure. This measure levied a duty for revenue only on such articles as would not compete with home manufactures, and a higher protective duty on those articles that did compete with home manufactures. Webster opposed this measure also, but his arguments were in the past, and Clay leaped to prominent leadership over Webster in that contest. Calhoun shifted his position; although still claiming to be a protectionist, he feared a high duty on English-made articles would cause England to levy a tax upon cotton products from the South. So from 1820 the fight started. Clay's American policy gained rapidly. In 1824 another tariff bill was passed. Following its passage the country enjoyed a prosperity never before felt. This prosperity was general and was felt by the farmer as well as the mining, shipping, and manufacturing interests. Tariff inequalities were bound to develop, and with them destructive political influences began to be developed. Exorbitant duties were often forced into the measures by the opponents of real protection or by the friends of protection by way of retaliation, with the result that for the next 20 years this doctrine was the source of much legislative discussion. But through it all the efficacy of the doctrine of protection was so generally recognized that it became a national policy. Advances and recessions followed each other as time went along. When Andrew Jackson came to the Presidency in 1831, the country was in a highly prosperous condition. Jackson sent a message to Congress strongly urging that the revenues coming into the Treasury were too much and should be cut down because the surplus was becoming too large. We often wonder in what respect does the present President think he resembles Andrew Jackson. Jackson was a defender of the Constitution and one who hated big debts. Clay, fighting for his idea of protection for protection's sake, consented for a reduction of the rates as they applied to articles which were not in competition with American-made articles; but the bill of 1832 was so unsatisfactory to some sections of the South that South Carolina passed its ordinance of nullification that brought on the clash between Jackson and Calhoun. Jackson was a protectionist. Clay found himself confronted by a serious situation. Although Jackson was adamant in his position as to the tariff, Clay could see the slavery question in the background. His Missouri Compromise of 1820 had not solved the slavery problem. Fearing that other States would follow the step taken by South Carolina, and always being ready to compromise one problem in order to settle another further along, Clay made concessions to Calhoun which, although preserving the principle of protection and preserving the protection for the northern industries, brought down upon his head the condemnation of many manufacturers. Clay's compromises earned for him the name of the "Great Pacificator", but it seemed that no economic measure could stay the inevitable conflict that was to decide the question of slavery.

DEPRESSION OF 1873

During the Civil War the North continued its policy of protection and the South, being principally an agricultural section, espoused free trade. So, after the war, as has always been the history of all countries and all wars, a great period of speculation followed which in turn was followed by a period of depression. In 1873 the inevitable depression was at hand. Although the Republican Party in the campaign of 1876 adopted a strong plank for protection and the Democrats adopted a strong plank against the then existing tariff law, the depression was the only real issue of this campaign, and, although a Republican President from Ohio was elected, a Democratic House was elected, and the Senate was Republican by two votes. William D. Kelley, known as "Pig Iron" Kelley, was a strong figure in the House and was the leader of the protectionists. He was aided very materially by Samuel J. Randall, the Speaker, who was a Democrat but a strong protectionist. The Democrats denounced all tariff for protection in most vigorous language. But the tariff had become a political and not an economic question. Every Member voted accordingly as his district was favorably or unfavorably affected. And the tariff admitted of much trading and logrolling. It had lost its high place as an important political and economic principle and was now a football for politicians.

M'KINLEY ENTERS CONGRESS

It was into this the Forty-fifth Congress that McKinley was first elected. He was then 33 years of age. His entry was the entry of a quiet, unassuming new Member, who followed the course that most wise, new men follow. He listened much and talked little for the first few years of his service. Rutherford B. Hayes was elected President at the election which brought McKinley to Congress. Hayes and McKinley enlisted in the same Ohio regiment at the same time. Hayes as a major and McKinley as a private. They fought together on many a bloody battlefield. Because of this friendship, scaled by blood and a kindred spirit, the door of the White House was always open to this new Congressman. There are hundreds of new and comparatively new Congressmen in this Congress who would be overwhelmed with importance if the present incumbent of the White House would establish similar relationship with them. But they can hardly expect it, for doubtless he thinks that he has done them the greatest favor of their lives by permitting them to ride into Congress on his strong and spacious coattails.

M'KINLEY AND TARIFF

Seeing the low estate to which this great doctrine of protective tariff had fallen, Mr. Hayes suggested to young McKinley that he could do well if he started in to study and master this subject. The young Congressman assayed this task with the same faithfulness and honesty of purpose that characterized him more than anything else and which was the greatest contributing factor to his gradual and irresistible rise to power and fame. That he succeeded well with this undertaking is one of the certainties of American history. His work in the advocacy of protection brought him in due course to the chairmanship of the powerful Ways and Means Committee of the House. His work as chairman of this committee marked the zenith of his service as a public servant. His work in this position contributed more to the welfare of the Nation than his work as Governor of the great State of Ohio, and more even than his work as President of these United States. He was elected to the Governorship of Ohio with but little oppositon because of his great work as a Congressman, and, in my humble opinion, he was elected to the Presidency for the same reason.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I yield,

Mr. COX. I wish to make just one observation. I am not, of course, disposed to quarrel with the gentleman's remarks on the tariff. As for myself, I think it has been the worst-fumbled proposition that has ever been dealt with by Congress. The only intelligent treatment that has been given it was the last legislation passed on the subject. My purpose in asking the gentleman to yield, however, was to express my very great appreciation of his fine tribute to that very great American, President McKinley. President McKinley for a number of years spent his winters in Thomasville, in the district I represent. He was of a democratic nature and was known and beloved by many of the people down there.

It was in my district and at the home of Mark Hanna where the leaders of the Republican Party met and determined upon Mr. McKinley's offering as the Republican candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I wanted to say what perhaps many of us know, that the tariff bill and its discussion in the American Congress in 1818 designated that policy as the American system. Then, as a little side issue, may I say that when I was a lad my father took me to a political rally in the great city of Dayton, Ohio, and on that occasion I heard speak William McKinley, John Sherman, and Joseph Benson Foraker, of Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I can assure the gentleman that at a political meeting in Ohio, not only in those days but even now, one can find plenty of strong men to expound the gospel of republicanism.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman is giving us a very interesting discussion. Will he not insert here the reason that South Carolina passed the nullification act following the tariff of 1828? Why did South Carolina pass the nullification act?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not know as any reason I would offer would be satisfactory to South Carolina.

Mr. ROBERTSON. May I suggest a reason?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman may.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Because agriculture in the South felt that after Jefferson had died, and Jefferson had been the restraining hand in tariff matters, the tariff of 1828 went so far in protection of northern industry that agriculture was definitely put at the bottom of the economic scale; therefore the State of South Carolina said she would not stay in the Union under such a tariff law. I may say further that Webster opposed the tariff of 1825 in his great speech of 1825, but supported the tariff in 1828. The question of secession came up and Hayne said:

I do not wish to interject the question of secession, but the South feels that the tariff has us down, and there is no hope for the southern farmers.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The business of the South was done largely with Great Britain in the cotton market, and it was not to the interest of the South, they felt, at that particular time to have this tariff in effect in connection with their dealings with Great Britain.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Has it ever been to the interest of the South to have a heavy tariff?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I stated at the outset, I do not want to get into a discussion of the arguments pro and con on these various matters, but I do thank both of the gentlemen for their contribution, and I will keep their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman stated that the question of slavery was properly a moral one and not an economic question. At some future date I should like to present the facts on the other side of the question to show it was an economic question.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I shall not get into an argument with the gentleman, but I thank him for his contribution. Anyway, Henry Clay was ever alert to prevent an open break between the North and the South.

May I comment on the statements made by the two gentlemen. Regardless of what Hayne thought, regardless of what Webster thought, regardless of what Calhoun thought, there were two men, one in the White House and one in the Speakership of the House of Representatives, who decided that proposition. Those two men were Andrew Jackson, with his courage and Henry Clay with his diplomacy. They got us out of the difficulty. But they threw the tariff issue in and made it, you may say, a football of politics.

M'KINLEY GERRYMANDERED

His strong and clear advocacy of the doctrine of protection brought to him the opposition of certain influences and of the opposing political party. This was to be expected. But probably no Congressman in the history of the country suffered so much from a fight carried right into his district. This was done by every means known to the most astute politicians, and in many instances the most unscrupulous politicians. The chief weapon employed was the gerrymander. This was followed by the most unusual personal campaigns, in which the leading men of the opposing political party were brought into this one district. When he made his first race in 1876, the district comprised his home county of Stark and the three additional counties of Mahoning, Carroll, and Columbiana. But when he ran for his second term in 1878 the district had been changed by dropping three of his four counties and adding three Democratic counties, but McKinley was reelected. He was reelected from the same district in 1880 and also in 1882, but in this last election his majority was cut down to 8 votes. He took the oath of office and served from March 4, 1883, to May 27, 1884, when Jonathan A. Wallace was seated, as he had contested the election. They redistricted again in 1884 by adding bigger Democratic counties to his district. But in 1884 his majority increased to 2,000 votes. He continued to represent this district with increasing majorities until 1890, which was the high tide of his work in Congress, when they redistricted him again by cutting off all the counties with any Republican leaning and adding two counties that were overwhelmingly Democratic. This, together with a tremendous personal fight made against him, defeated him by only 303 votes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be given 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEVER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. During the time of his services in Congress many other matters besides those rising out of the question of politics claimed McKinley's attention. He was a prominent figure in the councils of the Republican Party in Ohio. He was a strong figure in the national conventions of his party. In 1880 he took a prominent part in the convention that nominated James A. Garfield, who, like Hayes, had served with him in the Army. In the convention of 1884 his work as a parliamentarian and as a writer of platforms gave him a national prominence. The convention of 1888, although he was pledged to the support of John Sherman, when the fight between Sherman and Harrison began to drag out, McKinley declined the nomination because of his sense of loyalty to Sherman.

All these activities had put McKinley at the very pinnacle of political power. From election day in November 1890, when he was defeated for Congress, up to the date of the Ohio Republican convention of 1891 there was an irresistible ground swell in favor of Mr. McKinley for Governor of Ohio. It became evident that he would be the Republican nominee for that State. The defeat for which his opponents had worked so hard was in fact just another opportunity for this man of the common people to show his great quality of mind and heart. His nomination and election were accomplished easily and his second term came to him as a matter of course. His work as governor was equal to that of the many great governors that preceded him. But everybody realized that this man was a man of destiny and that destiny had marked him for the greatest honor in the gift of the people.

Benjamin Harrison was not personally popular but conditions were prosperous in his administration. In the midst of great prosperity a Democratic President and a Democratic House and Senate were elected.

Before the newly elected President had commenced his term, which would be the second term for Grover Cleveland, and which was the first time in the history of America that a President was twice elected with a term intervening, business and commerce had anticipated an enactment by Congress of legislation that would drastically lower all tariffs, and without waiting for the new President to take his office they immediately began to hedge and to prepare for another depression, and before the end of 1893, the year in which Cleveland started his second term, the country was described by R. G. Dun & Co. as being "in the worst condition for 50 years."

This, with the tinkering by a Democratic Congress with the finances of the country, made 1893 one of the most memorable in the financial and economic history of the Nation.

COURTEOUS GENTLEMAN

Mr. McKinley had the most profound respect of all of the clerks and secretaries and those in official capacity about the House of Representatives. There are some of them yet who remember McKinley well and they are loud in their praise of him. Mr. William Tyler Page, who has been a valued employee of Congress many years, has repeatedly told me of the wonderful ability and personal magnetism of this great man. Mr. Bert Kennedy, who has been connected with the House of Representatives for many years, remembers with great respect this great statesman. There was never any page boy but that could approach him with ease and calm. Mr. Harry Parker, the colored gentleman who has for so many years been the faithful attendant of the Ways and Means Committee, was an attendant of the Ways and Means Committee when Mr. McKinley was chairman of that great committee. Mr. Parker never fails of an opportunity to tell of the kindly and manly disposition of Mr. McKinley to all who knew him. Likewise the Democrats, especially those who were the leaders, recognized in him a man of fine parts and great ability. He had their respect as is shown by the records of congressional activities.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to corroborate what the gentleman has said about Mr. McKinley's having the affection of the Democrats while serving in the House. One of the distinguished Members of Congress from Texas at that time, Hon. Roger Q. Mills, lived in my home town and served upon the Ways and Means Committee with Mr. McKinley for many years. I have heard him speak frequently, as did his son after his death, of the affectionate regard that existed between Colonel Mills and Mr. McKinley, whom Mills esteemed as a very lovely and great man. Roger Q. Mills was a colonel in the Confederate Army and a stanch Democrat, while Mr. McKinley was a major in the Union Army and a leader in the Republican Party. When the Democrats controlled the House, Mills was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. McKinley and Mills were both great men; and, while they differed politically, they were warm personal friends.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I thank the gentleman. His is the universal testimony of those who knew this courteous man.

THE PRESIDENCY

In the campaign of 1892 McKinley was in more demand as a speaker than any other Republican in the Nation. This was largely because he was recognized everywhere as a statesman of high order and a gentleman of high character. The manner in which he was received all over the country indicated he was a great favorite of the people and presaged his choice as the next Republican candidate for the Presidency. After the campaign of 1892 men like Hanna were attracted to McKinley because of his fine qualities, and when the convention met at St. Louis in the spring of 1896 it was evident that, although there were many strong contenders for the nomination, the people were for McKinley. Candidates in that convention were Thomas B. Reed, Maine; Matthew S. Quay, Pennsylvania; Levi P. Morton, New York; Senator Allison, Iowa. McKinley was nominated on the first ballot with 661½ to 239½ for all the other candidates combined.

The Democrats nominated William Jennings Bryan. While Bryan was electrifying the people of the Nation as he met them in large crowds in all parts of the country, thousands upon thousands of the thoughtful people found their way to the front porch of McKinley's humble home in Canton, where they listened to his sound doctrines and sane political philosophy. They went away convinced that McKinley was safe. He was elected, and immediately, as if by magic, the chains of depression that bound the hands of the American people were stricken off and the country commenced another era of unbounded prosperity. He was reelected to a second term in 1900 over the same opponent.

McKinley's administration as President is noteworthy for three great events that transpired during that time: First, he laid the preliminary plans for the construction of the Panama Canal; second, he conducted the Spanish-American War to a glorious conclusion. He assumed responsibility that came with the control of new foreign possessions, and he safely guided the country out into a status that it had not up to that time occupied, for it was then a world power of the first magnitude. The third great event of his administration was a tragic one. An assassin—who could have had no personal enmity toward the President, who could not possibly profit in any way himself by his death, and whose action in taking his life would not be to the advantage of the world or any person in it—shot him down on September 6, 1901. Eight days thereafter he died.

THE ASSASSINATION

Most of us here remember how his assassination paralyzed the Nation, and we know of the anguish of the people during those 8 days of suspense. The sympathy of his great soul was shown as he admonished those about him to do his assassin no harm, and his great spirit seemed to hover among the people as they prayed their friend might recover. Stories of his tenderness and devotion to his invalid wife were told and retold and moved even the strongest men to tears as they recognized that virtue is its own reward. Business activities were almost at a standstill. Men and women everywhere gave themselves over completely to watching and waiting, and finally, when the end came, the Nation gave itself over to mourning for their great leader. With Motley, as he spoke of William of Orange, who died by an assassin's hand, we can say:

> As long as he lived, he was the guiding star of the whole Nation; and when he died, the little children cried in the streets.

CONCLUSION

The people of Ohio are rightfully proud of the achievements of many of her noble sons and daughters. In the statehouse yard in Columbus can be seen a statue of a woman holding out her hands as if to bless and in pride she is made to say: "These are my jewels." Around her and the subjects of her pride are the statues of these—Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Garfield, Hayes, Chase, and Stanton. Here in this statue is the story of the Civil War. To this group could be added the figure of McKinley without dimming its luster.

The Republicans of Ohio are proud of the part Ohio Republicans have taken in the affairs of the Nation. The Republican Party started with Lincoln. The Republicans of Ohio are justly proud of the fact that every Republican elected President of the United States, from Lincoln to Hoover, who did not succeed to the Presidency from the Vice Presidency, came from Ohio. Stalwart they all were—Grant, Garfield, Hayes, Harrison, McKinley, Taft, and Harding. McKinley is probably the only one of them who laid the very foundation of his greatness here in this room where we are now gathered. McKinley, as much or more than any of them, through his kindness of soul endeared himself to the whole people.

Much as Ohio reveres the name of McKinley, we recognize that he belongs to the Nation. She leaves him alone in the glory that all Americans ascribe to him.

And, Mr. Speaker, as a humble Congressman for Ohio I still say that William McKinley contributed more for the well-being of this country than any Congressman ever honored with a seat in this great body. [Applause.]

PERMISSION OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO SIT DURING SESSION OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during the session of the House this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEVER). The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during the session of the House this afternoon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the address of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Do I understand that is in addition to the program already arranged?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting for 3 days now to take up House Resolution 11, and we will patiently sit here for about 3 hours more during the delivery of addresses, and I hope they are as good and interesting as the one we have just heard from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], because that was very fine, and I enjoyed it; but I ask the gentleman from New York to make his request to follow action of the House on House Resolution 11. Then I shall not object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there are certain reasons why I wish the address of Mr. GIFFORD to come directly after that of Mr. HOFFMAN, and then I shall not object to the gentleman from Virginia bringing in his resolution a little later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CONTROL OF FLOODS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the great streams and watercourses of the country have become a serious problem before the Nation, a continuing, menacing threat to property, and to economic welfare and security as well, with periodical and recurring waste and loss amounting higher and higher from year to year.

But more than loss and waste of property, more than interruption of industry, commerce, and trade, is the jeopardy of disease and pestilence following in the wake of flood disasters directly with many violent deaths and indirectly with appalling loss of health and life.

The improvement of the streams and watercourses involves more than the single problem of safeguarding against flood disasters. They are included in many different works separately under way and construction to provide inland-waterway navigation, irrigation, safeguarding from stream pollution, conserving municipal water supplies, and the development of the electric power.

Many projects for these separate purposes are already partially constructed or under way, and many bills for other separate improvements of rivers, streams, and watercourses, each providing for a separate system of works for different improvements for the same streams to accomplish these different objects separately, are pressing for attention and congressional action.

And to avoid this confusion of works and improvements, and to obviate this piecemeal order of construction and of the increased cost of loss and waste of overlapping and duplicating projects, and of works to serve one purpose interfering with or rendering useless improvements to serve another purpose, I have prepared a bill creating a separate executive department of inland watercourses and providing for the construction of a unified system of improvements, coordinating all the different works and projects under way or proposed to serve all these different purposes for which rivers and streams are being improved.

Under such an executive department and an exclusive inland watercourse authority every one of these great purposes of flood control, inland water navigation, irrigation, safeguarding against stream pollution, the conservation of municipal water supplies, and the development of electric power can all be accomplished and carried out by river and watercourse improvements under one unified and coordinated system at great saving and economy of construction, efficiency, and operations, and the cost of the works and improvements, or a great part of the cost, paid for by the sale of electric power developed.

It must be realized that any governmental authority authorized and instructed to construct such improvements must be unified and exclusively included in one department, administration, or authority in order that the different purposes can be served and the different objects can be accomplished without sacrifice or impairment of the other.

This requires a surrender of the limited jurisdiction of many different existing departments not directly controlling the watercourses to accomplish the different objects and purposes and the whole authority brought within the department of inland watercourses for unified and coordinated improvements.

The problem of flood control is national and the improvements must be linked together in a system of interstate projects, and coordinated with a defense program as well as to serve the purposes of promoting the general welfare in peace and civil life.

The bill I have prepared and introduced, H. R. 3872, will accomplish all of these purposes promptly, without delay or further waiting, economically, and with a saving of billions by coordination to avoid piecemeal construction and duplication and overlapping operations.

The Nation is again brought face to face with the criminal folly of man, with short-sighted greed and improvidence in cutting off the timber and natural growth and leaving the earth bare, exposed, and lifeless, not only marring the face of nature but leaving the land barren for erosion and without safeguards against flood disasters.

The cleared land has left the slopes to carry the waters to the stream channels as rapid, precipitous, and to pass as swift, as from the steep roofs of buildings, carrying the waters to the gutters and eaves' trough, and through the downspout to the ground, as rapid as the rain falls or the snow melts.

The waters from the rains and snows must be retarded and held back for slow and gradual release within the capacity of the stream channels, or the dwellings of towns and cities now built only above the normal water line must be moved back to higher ground.

The clearing of the land to bring this condition has been in slow progress for a century. Reforestry is likewise a slow accomplishment. Even if the natural order of vegetation can be restored, the security of property and human life cannot wait on the slow recovery by nature. Something must be done in the alternative to compensate for the vandalism of man.

Fortunately the torrents of water recede as rapidly as they come or advance, and the people, as suddenly relieved and left to contemplate the loss of property and life, follow back the retreating waters and resume the normal order of their ways, like the ancient Italians returned to Pompeii under the shadows of the ashes of Mount Vesuvius.

Fortunately the torn face of nature smiles to encourage and revive the hopes of men, and creation unfolds and offers a plan whereby to arrest and hold flood waters until men can contemplate their vandalism, the ruthless desecration of nature, and restore the forests and vegetation.

The channels of the lower and larger streams, by nature, adapted only to carry the water held back for slow and gradual release by the forests and restraining vegetation, are not wide enough or deep enough to accommodate the mad onrush of the flow from above.

Instead of straining to raise the banks of the lower streams and watercourses by building dikes and levees to accommodate an unnatural volume of water, the waters at the source above, and from the tributaries, must be held back to accommodate the capacity of the lower channels.

The waters breaking over and overflowing the banks of the lower streams should never be allowed to reach the scenes of their havoc and destruction, but held in reservoirs and basins in the upper streams and tributaries, and released in a gradual flow.

The broken dikes and levees along the lower Ohio and Mississippi Rivers will remain only as a monument to the criminal folly of men in straining the banks of the channels to carry an impossible volume of water caused by the clearing of the land in violation of the order of nature.

The havoc and destruction of floodwaters are like other great evils and scourges. They must first be dealt with and the remedy applied at the source, instead of locally at the place of damage or destruction. The excess water held back at the source and in the tributaries for gradual and modified release, and the channels below will carry the floodwaters to the sea.

Fortunately, and, as if designed by Providence, the deeper and wider channels of the greater streams are intercepted from the source to mouth by smaller streams flowing in through valleys, of varying width and extending back long distances, and forming natural reservoirs or basins, and of capacity to hold surplus floodwaters. It may also become necessary to dam the upper course of the larger rivers below the intercepting streams and valleys, and allow the rising floodwaters to exhaust the force of their fury by filling these natural basins or reservoirs, extending back each way on either side for miles. One reservoir or basin first and then another can be filled at higher water stage and the waters held for gradual release to accommodate river channels at safe water levels, wherever such dams can be constructed without inundating cities and populous areas.

The taking of these intersecting valleys for flood basins and reservoirs will not be a loss of the property taken. New and valuable economic uses will be found for these permament bodies of water, and their existence will conserve atmospheric moisture and more regular rainfall.

Such inland waterway improvements will relieve the inhabitants of the stricken areas of fear, apprehension, and painful suspense, coming with the beginning of every protracted rainfall, and bring assurance of permanent safety and dependability for these locations and the enjoyment of home and business security.

Incidentally, the work of the construction of such watercourse improvements will furnish a wide diversity of labor and a broad spread of employment, and will be carried to every watercourse community from which the swift flow of flood water must be retarded and held back in reservoirs to safeguard the flood stage of the larger streams.

And incidentally, with such a program of inland waterway improvements bringing security of property and life from the devastation of flood waters, the work and construction of the projects would absorb all or much of the idle waiting labor and relieve the employment crisis for years to come.

And when the great resources of income are realized from the weight of falling waters in the sale of hydroelectric power, and in large and increased volume, developed from all the streams and watercourses, and made available for payment of the cost, the people will be well and fully assured of the redemption of the money issued and expended without the burden of increased taxes, or the banks and bond investors would likewise be assured with confidence beyond the obligation of the Government to pay.

Under modern invention and power mechanism, every pound of falling flood water, which, if retarded and held back, can be converted into water power, and every unit of water power can be transformed into electric power and sold on the market to electrical consumers.

Flood waters retarded and held back and released with the normal flow of streams, and their weight used over and over again with the fall of the streams from source to mouth, if converted or transformed into water power and, in turn, into electric power, will bring billions in power income.

And if all the weight of falling waters of all the inland watercourses was utilized and converted into water power and sold to farmers, home owners, manufacturers, and industries, the revenues and income brought to the Government would pay the cost of all the improvements and maintain upkeep and operating expenses.

The economic loss and waste of flood waters, the destruction of homes and business property, the interruption of industry and trade are not all the losses and wastes resulting; the loss of waters in wasting power will go far to equal the loss and waste from the destruction of the floods.

If all the weight of flood waters from all the streams and watercourses was retarded and held back in dams, basins, and reservoirs, and was gradually released with the normal currents and used in the development of electric power, and if all the river-course improvements were coordinated under a unified system, coordinating all the facilities and activities provided, and all such improvements made to serve all the uses and purposes for which adapted, or to which the construction would contribute, the earnings and income and revenues derived would pay the cost of all the improvements for flood control and inland navigation, for irrigation and safeguarding against stream pollution, for conserving and providing municipal water supplies and the cost of all the power creating facilities, and the expenditures of maintenance and operation, or go far to pay for such expenditures.

The loss of the wasting flood-water power added to the loss by flood destruction makes the economic loss and waste by flood of almost incalcuable magnitude, to say nothing of disease, pestilence, and exposure and the appalling loss of health and life, and makes a calamity which no people can afford to suffer without taking measures to provide against a repetition.

This devastating and destructive flood, with the appalling loss of property and life, should awake men to weigh and consider and to read the rebuke of violated Nature and the handwriting on the walls of many cities left in ruin and chaos.

From an uncontrollable destructive force carrying disease, pestilence, and suffering, with the loss of property and life, these inland streams can be transformed into an agency of security and welfare, a property asset, valuable in the billions, a blessing and a source of increased wealth. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order of business heretofore established, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall now introduce a resolution which I have prepared, and I shall read it and invite your attention to its provisions and merits, and then shall discuss it briefly and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration:

Joint resolution to authorize the submission to Congress of a comprehensive national plan for the prevention and control of floods of all of the major rivers of the United States, and for other purposes

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to submit to Congress with reasonable expedition a full report or a series of reports embodying a comprehensive national program and plan for the control of floods of all of the major rivers of the United States and their principal tributaries. The Chief of Army Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, is authorized and directed to conduct necessary surveys, assemble information, and prepare such a comprehensive plan, which shall include provisions for the construction of levees, spillways, diversion channels, channel rectification, reservoirs, and all other works necessary for an effective and adequate system of flood control for all such rivers. Such plan and the report to Congress shall list specific projects and set forth estimates of cost, including the expense of acquiring land, easements, and payment of property damages of carrying out the project. Such plan and report or reports shall take into consideration flood-control projects now under consideration or heretofore authorized by acts of Congress.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution and in making this appeal for its immediate consideration and favorable action by this body, there is nothing partisan in what is proposed. There is nothing in this measure that gives any peculiar benefit or advantage to the people I represent over those of any other valley in the United States, but it is my thought that in view of our experience in the present catastrophe flood control is no longer a local problem in any community or in any valley, but is a national problem, and one which challenges this Congress and succeeding Congresses until these problems have been solved and an effective flood-control system constructed on all our principal streams.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. Why did not the gentleman include a survey of the power possibilities of all these streams, which would greatly help to take care of the cost of such a program?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think such information has already been submitted, but the resolution certainly would be open to amendment, and I have no objection to that being included.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I am in sympathy with a great part of the gentleman's resolution. As a matter of fact, the first really prepared speech I ever made on the floor of this House was along the general lines of the gentleman's resolution, to the effect that the only way we would ever control floods was by making a systematic study of the upper reaches of the various branches of these streams throughout the whole country. The gentleman therefore knows that I am in sympathy with what he has in mind, but I am firmly convinced the gentleman's resolution is altogether too far reaching to be taken up by unanimous consent without previous consideration and notice to the House. I think this is a matter that properly should go to the Flood Control Committee.

This is all-important, as the gentleman has said, and all-important matters cannot be considered on the spur of the moment, even if we are sympathetic with them. I know it will tend to better consideration and more thorough consideration of the very object the gentleman has in mind if this matter is referred to the Committee on Flood Control, and with the request that they act as promptly as possible.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As a member of the Committee on Flood Control, I certainly have no objection to the resolution being referred there. It is only my thought that in view of the conditions which which we are confronted, Congress ought not vacillate and procrastinate any longer on this important matter. We either ought to take definite action or let the country know that we are not vitally concerned and that they can expect no relief from their National Government.

Mr. SNELL. There is a committee set up purposely for this one thing. I brought in the rule to establish it myself, and I know. They should take it up immediately and give it as much consideration as is needed. I will help the gentleman along that line, but I am sure it would be a mistake to try to consider that here today by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am not arguing that with the gentleman. I hope the gentleman will help me get an extension of time so that I can speak on the merits of this.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, certainly.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Has the gentleman investigated carefully the report of the Mississippi Valley Commission that has been working on this subject for the past 3 or 4 years?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have, but I cannot say that I am an authority on it. However, the point I want to make with this House is that I do not believe there is a Member of this House today who can sit down here and draft a bill including a comprehensive plan covering all the major streams of the Nation. It is my belief that we are never going to have flood control in America until the Federal Government assumes responsibility for it, and whenever it does assume responsibility for it it ought to assume it for every major stream, and not for mine or yours alone. That is the plan I am seeking. I am seeking to have the War Department, the best source of information that I know of to go to, to submit us data and information and then say to us what, in its opinion and judgment, will constitute an effective program for the elimination of the menace of floods.

Mr. KELLER. May I suggest to the gentleman if he will investigate the report I referred to it is a very extensive report. The study has been made of that very broadly and it would furnish a basis on which the gentleman might improve his idea at the present time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Let me say this: If that report does contain ample information upon which a bill can be predicated to accomplish these results, I am sure there are many Members of this Congress who are much smarter than I, and I do not see a bill here today that does it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I remember with keen interest the gentleman's remarks during the Seventy-fourth Congress on this subject. I recall that at that time I asked him if he did not feel it was necessary that effective measures for prevention of floods, rather than for protection after the floods became a menace, must be the concern of this Congress.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I ask further, since there have been authorizations made upon worth-while projects brought from the Army engineers, the source that the gentleman believes able to handle the situation, is it not the duty of this Congress at the earliest opportunity, and that is now, to put into effect the appropriations to cover the authorizations made?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes, sir; and I hope the appropriations will be made at this session of the Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEVER). The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes. This is an intensely interesting subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact, in the gentleman's opinion, that we must have a comprehensive system of small dams upon all tributary streams?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will answer the gentleman in this way: It is my idea that we will never have flood control until the Federal Government assumes responsibility for it, and when it assumes it, it ought to assume it on all the major streams of the Nation. I am not an engineer and I cannot say whether there should be a reservoir here or a spillway there or a levee some place else. I must rely upon information of others who are better equipped than I to get it and who are trained for that purpose. I cannot qualify as an engineer.

At the present time we have the War Department, with the great Army engineers, on whom we can rely, and that certainly is the source for us to appeal to. I am asking them in this resolution, in view of the study they have made and any additional study they may be able to make, to assemble and to submit to the Congress a plan that they will recommend and endorse as one that will afford a solution.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman's resolution, but I think it should contain also a survey of power and navigation questions, and all other questions that pertain to floods in rivers and streams.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say I think that is a very wise provision, but that would not give any relief from floods. It could be taken up in conjunction with it, and probably should be.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact, before any comprehensive flood-control legislation can be enacted, and before the flood-control legislation that is now in force can be carried into execution, Congress will have to amend the Act of June 22, 1936, the act referred to by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is that the omnibus flood-control act the gentleman refers to?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. I said at the time it was passed that it would not be effective and would get no results.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Is there not marked discrimination now in the legislation that has been enacted by this Congress, particularly by the Seventy-fourth Congress, in reference to various streams in the country?

The only way that it can be put on an equitable basis is by the modification of both the statute of 1928 and a modification affecting the act of June 15, 1936, and the act of June 22, 1936.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not want to get into a debate or an argument as to what ought to be done with existing law. I am talking now about the question and advocating now a comprehensive flood-control program. This resolution provides that in submitting such a plan the War Department shall take into account flood-control projects that are already in course of construction and which have been authorized; and the plan they may submit, of course, may contain a modification of projects that have already been authorized; and they will be authorized under this resolution to do it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am in complete agreement with the gentleman's assertions that the present conditions and the control of floods is a national problem, although in my district I have no flood situation confronting me and have had none in the past. I take it the gentleman believes, or is of the opinion, that the Federal Government should purchase the land necessary to erect dams or for any other purposes along the lines of control with reference to the future. Is that correct?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will first answer the gentleman, yes; and then enlarge upon my answer.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am entirely in agreement with the gentleman; so there is no controversy there.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I argued at the last session of Congress when flood-control bills were under consideration—and I say again today—we are never going to have an effective flood-control system in the United States, one that will give protection, until and unless the Federal Government accepts it as a national problem and will pay the cost of construction. The reason I say that is that whenever local interests make contributions or share the burden of responsibility the local community insists on saying how it shall be done and they want it handled so as to benefit their own local interests. As long as this situation obtains it will be impossible to have a coordinated and comprehensive treatment of what is really a national problem.

Mr. McCORMACK. Personally, I am in complete agreement with the gentleman's statement just made. Following it further, however, it is going to be piecemeal unless we raise the money, and it is going to cost several hundreds of millions of dollars. Personally I am in favor of additional taxes specifically for this purpose, either by way of a general manufacturers' excise tax or by lowering the income-tax exemptions for a period of 1 or 2 years. In 1 year this would raise about $350,000,000, and in 2 years $700,000,000. It is best to meet the problem as quickly as possible rather than by piecemeal activity on our part.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say to the gentleman that the purpose of the resolution is to get away from piecemeal action and toying with this great problem. May I say further that at the moment I am not concerned with how the money is to be raised. It is not the purpose nor within the province of the Army engineers to tell us in response to this resolution how to raise money and how to finance flood control. I hold that that is the function of Congress. It is all right for us to call on the War Department and the Army engineers to submit an engineering plan, but the responsibility is ours after the plan is submitted as to whether we shall authorize it to be carried out and how we shall finance it, and whether local interests should make any contribution. These are matters for Congress to decide, and not the War Department.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If the gentleman will allow one further interruption, I cannot help but believe, as a layman, not as an engineer, that in spite of the expenditure of large sums of money for flood walls and levees downstream we are finding year after year the length of those levees increasing and reaching back farther upstream. Does not the gentleman feel, as a layman, that we must attack the series of small streams at the headwaters?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am in complete accord with the gentleman on this modification, but I do not believe that dams and reservoirs on the headwaters alone will be sufficient.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do believe we ought to have just what I have called for, a coordinated system of levees, reservoirs, channel rectifications, spillways, and whatever is necessary.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And reforestation?

Mr. McCLELLAN. This does not contemplate reforestation; that is carried on by the Department of Agriculture. I am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman is in favor of it, is he not?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. COX. I have no desire to combat or to endeavor to resist the force of the very admirable argument the gentleman is making; but, in the light of my experience and from what I happen to know about the problem the gentleman is discussing, I am not entirely in accord with the gentleman when he insists that the Congress should adopt the policy of declaring flood control a national matter. The gentleman has evidenced familiarity with the flood problem and the treatment of it on the part of the National Government over a long period of time. The gentleman, of course, knows that up until recently this was regarded as entirely a local problem.

Mr. McCLELLAN. May I interrupt the gentleman? I hope he will get me more time if he takes up all of mine.

Mr. COX. I apologize for interrupting the gentleman. I could not, of course, ask a question without predicating it upon an assumption.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I would like to make some concluding remarks.

Mr. COX. May I ask this question? The gentleman speaks of adopting a comprehensive plan. Is the gentleman familiar with studies made by the War Department in years gone by?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does he understand it to be a fact that it would take around $10,000,000,000 to treat this problem in a comprehensive manner?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 6 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be permitted now to conclude my remarks without interruption.

I have pretty well, in answering the questions propounded, given my view that this is purely a national problem and will never be solved until the National Government assumes responsibility. It is true that a few years ago we did not accept relief and charity as a problem, burden, or obligation of the National Treasury, but we do today. You accept it today gladly because of changed conditions which have made it necessary.

With this disastrous flood, this great catastrophe that has come to our Nation, and taking further into account devastating floods of the past, we should no longer say that we are going to attempt to place this impossible burden on those who we already know are unable to bear it. How could you go down the Ohio Valley and the Mississippi Valley today, where this flood has inundated millions of acres of land including large cities, some of the largest in our Nation, and literally destroyed billions of dollars of property, thus diminishing our material wealth, and tell those people, property owners, that, in order to repair their levees, in order to build a fortress against a recurrence of what they are now suffering, they will have to make local contributions and bear the cost of construction? They would not be able to do it. And if our valleys, some of them the richest in the world, are going to be conserved and developed for the advancement of agriculture and the use of future farmers of our Nation, and millions of human lives protected, the Federal Government must provide and finance an adequate flood-control system. It is not primarily a local problem nor a State problem, because the waters in my State come from the rainfall in yours; therefore it is national in scope. It will never be corrected except by action on the part of the National Government.

I hope this resolution will be adopted. I am only seeking information that you and I ought to have, and the country ought to have; information that is going to be necessary if we legislate wisely, and it should be our purpose to so legislate. We should not approach this thing any longer with timidity. Too long we have waited already; further procrastination and delay is inexcusable. We ought to approach it with courage, wisdom, and statesmanship and let the American people know their Congress is going to undertake to solve it for them.

May I drop this further thought to you? We have spent in the past 4 or 5 years, or since 1933, about $15,000,000,000 for direct relief and for work relief. We have recently appropriated another huge sum of money, more than three-quarters of $1,000,000,000 for the same purpose. When the funds that we have recently appropriated are exhausted, we will have to appropriate more, and those who may kid themselves into thinking we will not have to do so will only have to await the time to discover their error.

Mr. Speaker, is it not wiser as a national policy in the future, if we are going to have to spend money for relief, to spend it on flood-control projects that when constructed will add to our national wealth, preserve and make available for utilization one of our greatest natural resources, our fertile valleys? If we will do this, we will have something to show for the dent we are making in the Federal Treasury, and in my judgment such a policy is expedient even though it should ultimately cost the stupendous sum of $10,000,000,000, which the gentleman suggests; but it will not cost that much.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does the gentleman know that the Army engineers in their report, I think Public Document No. 306, made 2 or 3 years ago, estimate if they could have $280,000,000, and they have indicated about 30 or 40 places to spend this money, it would take 8 feet off the flood? If this could be done for that small amount of money, we do not need $10,000,000,000 to do this.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have not said we need $10,000,000,000. That was the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia. This is what I am trying to do, and I trust the gentleman will go along with us and give us his support on this resolution. The purpose is to get something concrete so we will not be guessing as we spend this money, and so we will not leave those folks out there in the uncertainty and dread of a recurrence of what they are now being afflicted with.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman, but may I say, do not get scared at the amount of money, because this job has to be done. However, it is not going to take that amount of money.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I hope it does not take that amount of money, and I believe it can be done for approximately half that amount. May I say this further: I have no pride of authorship in this resolution. I had hoped, in view of the stress of the emergency, that we might pass it today by unanimous consent, but I understand there has been an agreement between the leaders on both sides of the House that no business of importance will be transacted today. Therefore, under the circumstances I do not now hope to have it considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the resolution going to the Flood Control Committee, but I want to say it behooves every Member of this House to concern himself with a correct solution of the flood-control problem in America. The Members of this House should be aggressive and alert in trying to bring about a solution at this session of the Congress. The American people are looking to this Congress not only for a plan but for a program to be put into execution, and I hope you will join with me in trying to get this resolution favorably acted on by the committee. Let us pass it. Let us call on the agencies of our Government to give us the information, and when we have it let us legislate upon the matter wisely and give relief to the American people, as well as protect and preserve the natural wealth and resources of our Nation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE FEDERAL COURTS

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to reply to some remarks that were made yesterday on the Constitution and the courts by my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

One of the great liberal judges of the Supreme Court, a man I am pleased to designate as the grand old man of America, Hon. Louis D. Brandeis, once said in one of his important opinions:

> Experience should teach us to be most on guard to protect liberty when the purposes of government are beneficent. Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel invasion of their liberty by evil-minded persons. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well meaning, but without understanding.

When a man who enjoys no reputation for truth and character says something, even though it is false, it makes little difference, because those who know him do not believe him even when he tells the truth. But when a man of the finest motives, unimpeachable character, and the purest patriotism speaks to the American people and is wrong and inaccurate, not as a matter of opinion but as a matter of fact in what he says, it is apt to do great damage, because his character gives credit to his words.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] is a gentleman of the kind I have last described, and it is only because it seemed to me that his remarks yesterday were as full of error as a pomegranate is full of seeds that I venture to speak today.

I want to make plain at the beginning that I am not opposed to constitutional change by act of the people. I have voted for two constitutional amendments which have been accepted by the people and are now the supreme law of the land. I am prepared to give the Federal Government whatever power is indispensably necessary for it to have. I am also ready to give the States whatever powers they need to deal with the changing conditions of modern life, and I am referring now particularly to the minimum-wage decision of last spring.

I am opposed, however, to the Federal Government doing anything which the States and the local communities can, and should, do for themselves. I still think that Jefferson is right in all cases except where Hamilton is inevitable.

My friend, the gentleman from Texas, however, goes further than advocating orderly constitutional change. He favors depriving the Federal courts of the power to pass on legislative acts. In the course of his remarks he returned to the Dred Scott decision. This is always gone back to by critics of the Court, and the gentleman from Texas charged the Supreme Court of the United States with responsibility for the Civil War and implied that except for their action, if the matter had been left to the wisdom of Congress, there might have been no Civil War. He said, "Suppose the Missouri Compromise had not been knocked out by the courts." The answer to that is, Mr. Speaker, that the Missouri Compromise was not knocked out by the courts. This case was decided in 1857, and the Missouri Compromise had been knocked out by an act of Congress, by outright repeal, 3 years before that case was decided. One month after the Dred Scott case was first instituted in the Circuit Court of the United States for Missouri, Congress knocked out the Missouri Compromise, and the decision in that case, therefore, did not hold unconstitutional any act that was then in force. No existing law was declared unconstitutional.

The gentleman then says that the Supreme Court, in defiance of the laws of the United States and the will of the American people, including the southern people, who, he said, "had also accepted the compromise", thus thwarted the will of the American Nation. The answer to that, as I have already stated, is that the Missouri Compromise had been repealed by act of Congress in May 1854 and repealed chiefly by votes from the Southern States.

I have no disposition to again fight the Civil War, but only mention this in the interest of historical accuracy with reference to what the gentleman from Texas said.

Then the gentleman goes on to say that the Nation was "plunged into 4½ years of killing to reverse a decision of the Supreme Court." This could not be true in view of the act of Congress of 1854, and the impartial historian of today absolves the Supreme Court of the United States of any major responsibility for the Civil War. It was probably an "inevitable conflict." But if any prime responsibility with reference to the Missouri Compromise as a contributing factor toward those 4 years of blood and carnage is to be attributed to anybody, it is the Congress of the United States in repealing the Missouri Compromise and thus reintroducing slavery into the Louisiana Territory, and it is time, Mr. Speaker, that the responsibility, insofar as there is a responsibility, be placed where it belongs—on the Congress of the United States and not on the Supreme Court. [Applause.]

It is also of interest to note that immediately following the decision in the Dred Scott case, when the passions and the fury of the people were at full cry, bills were introduced in the Congress to repeal section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1792 and to take from the Supreme Court the power which it did exercise in the Dred Scott decision. But, to the honor of the Congress at that time, despite the passions of the hour, not a single one of those bills was ever reported favorably by a congressional committee. [Applause.]

I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I have heard that history repeats itself, and because of that I venture to say that if we should attempt now what was attempted then, the result now would be the same as the result then.

We are not going to get very far now any more than the critics did in 1858 in taking from the courts of the United States the power to pass on acts of legislative bodies. "The shallows murmur but the deeps are dumb."

I have a distinct feeling that there are tens of millions of people living in quiet homes—farmers, workingmen, merchants, businessmen, investors, veterans, and others—who want now, as they have in the past, to have somewhere in this Republic a body to whom they can submit questions of great import to them, affecting life, liberty, reputation, or property, and have that question—their question—decided by a body of men who will render judgment in their cases uninfluenced by the pressure of politics, partisan expediency, the wishes of those who sit in the seats of power, or the turbulent clamor of the mob.

It is interesting to recall the powerful and popular figures who have attempted to criticize the Supreme Court in years gone by.

I will not say that in relation to some particular case the criticism might not have been justified, but I am thinking now of such great figures as Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt, who undertook to criticize the courts of this country, and with what result? The only result that insofar as their criticism might have been meant or would naturally tend to impair the prestige and confidence in the Supreme Court by the American people, the criticism reacted on the critics and not on the Court.

My friend from Texas goes on to discuss the income-tax case of 1895. He said that the Court in deciding the income-tax case "had to reverse, overrule, and find void five of its own decisions handed down over a period of a hundred years."

His statement as an opinion amounts to nothing but opinion, but as a statement of fact the gentleman from Texas is entirely wrong, because the Supreme Court refused to overrule a single previous decision, and held that the previous cases differed from the facts then before them for the first time. And in one respect that case was the first attempt to tax interest received by the owners of State and municipal bonds, a question which had never been before the Court up to that time—and in that respect that decision of the Court in 1895 was unanimous.

And neither the Court, Congress, nor the American people in adopting the sixteenth amendment ever reversed that part of that decision.

But aside from this, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] falls into a curious dilemma. He blames the Court for changing its mind and thus failing, as he says, "in its duty to provide stability"; but in the same speech he pleads for a "living Constitution, not a dead one", and urges that the Court should "be responsive to the will of the people"; in other words, they should follow the election returns. In arguing that the Supreme Court should not change its mind and thus "destroy stability", he argues that a living court must be bound by decisions made by judges long dead, but in arguing that a court must recognize that times have changed, he argues that the Court should not be bound, in the interest of stability, by decisions previously made. So whatever the Court does with reference to previous cases, it is bound to be wrong.

The gentleman refers to the World War Draft Act case, and he makes this astonishing statement. He said that the act to draft soldiers "against their will is constitutional although not in the Constitution." Elsewhere he argues that Congress has not only powers expressly granted but also those incidental powers necessary to effectuate the express powers. As Congress does have the power to "declare war", "to raise and support armies", and "to provide and maintain a navy", all of which require soldiers and sailors, the power to draft must be constitutional, even though, as the gentleman says, "it is not in the Constitution." I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas argues for once in favor of a narrow construction of the Constitution, so as to give us an army without soldiers and a navy but no sailors, except so far as men might volunteer.

He then speaks of the Curtiss-Wright case, decided last December, and says, "It was held that the President had almost unlimited power in foreign relations, and his actions were constitutional because they proceeded from the British Crown." Again I say that the Court held no such thing. What the Court had before it was not the British Crown, but an act of Congress, the Neutrality Resolution of 1934, which gave the President power to declare embargoes, and so forth, and not the naked power of the Executive to act wholly independent of congressional authority.

The gentleman from Texas next cites the case of Evans against Gore, with respect to income taxes paid by Federal judges, and he says to this Congress—and he repeated it in a radio address to his listeners throughout the length and breadth of this land:

I want you to know that in the income-tax case that soon came to the Court, the Supreme Court of the United States held that Federal judges did not have to pay a cent of income tax.

"Everyone else did", he said, "but not members of the Supreme Court and the lesser Federal judges. They exempted themselves." Again I say that the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who is taking it upon himself to lecture the Supreme Court of this country, fell into grave error. The Supreme Court did not hold, as the gentleman from Texas said, that members of the Federal judiciary "did not have to pay a cent of income tax." They held only that that part of a judge's income which comes from the salary paid to him by the Federal Government is not subject to a tax by the Federal Government. On all other income judges pay income tax the same as any other citizen. I say that that statement of the gentleman from Texas which went over the radio, ignorantly and in good faith so far as he was concerned, was nevertheless poison, because the inevitable tendency of it is to inflame the feelings of our people against their judges, on the implication that without any justification whatever but for some purely arbitrary reason, and in a matter that concerned them, judges had set themselves off as a group of untouchables with reference to a tax levy which all other citizens had to pay.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield.

Mr. COX. I am in entire sympathy with the position that the gentleman takes, and I applaud him for meeting his responsibility. As I take it, it is his responsibility to speak his mind when so important a question as attacks on the Supreme Court are involved, but does not the gentleman feel in respect to the last statement quoted of the gentleman from Texas that it was so nearly right that it might be passed by as being right, because I hardly think the public could have taken it to mean anything more than that the Supreme Court had held that Federal judges were exempt from the payment of income tax on the salaries paid to them by the Government? That is evidently what the gentleman from Texas intended, and I think it is what the public understood him to say.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further. I have no desire to do injustice to anyone, least of all my good friend Mr. MAVERICK. If we are at the threshold of another great constitutional debate, so far as I am concerned, I want to keep it on a high level, the same high level on which the subject matter itself rests. I can only draw my own interpretation as to how such a statement the gentleman from Texas made would be received by people listening in on the radio, wholly ignorant of the case itself and without ability to advise themselves as to what the facts really were. Is it true that the Supreme Court acted without good reason? No. The reason they held that so much of a judge's income as is derived from the salary paid to him by the Federal Government is exempt from income tax is a provision of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The judges, both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

That case was decided by a 7-to-2 vote. Justice Brandeis and Justice Holmes dissented. But you must agree that the reason assigned by the majority was a reasonable one, which intelligent men might honestly hold, in saying that the Federal Government could not grant a judge a salary and then take it away from him by taxes. That provision was put in the Constitution of 1787, as the debates show and as the Federalist papers show, for the purpose of making certain that the judiciary of the Federal Government shall be forever free from legislative pressure, because they said the power over the purse is power over the judgment of the judge.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman believe that an amendment to the Constitution does not have power to repeal or to nullify that part of the Constitution already existing?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Oh, certainly.

Mr. KELLER. Then how could that decision be made?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am not now arguing whether the decision is right or not. I am simply saying that the decision of the majority of the Court was predicated upon a reasonable base, and was not arbitrary or prompted by selfish motives.

I have now discussed the five cases that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] referred to, and I think I have shown he was inaccurate with respect to all of them.

I will now turn to his more general recommendations. He said the power of the courts to pass on acts of the legislative branch is an "assumed power", "a self-asserted power", a power which the Constitution does not say the Supreme Court has. Then over the radio he asks his hearers to write to their Representatives in Congress telling them that "they are weary of judges destroying their laws" and urging them—that means us—to support laws to deprive at least the lower Federal judges "of the power to destroy the people's legislation."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is a large subject. I do not have time to discuss it now. I will extend my remarks on it. However, I will have time to go to the record on one point. In listening to statements such as that, and many others that are being made in America today, one would think that all Federal judges do is to sit up nights to "destroy" acts of Congress, and generally by a 5-to-4 vote. What are the facts? In 147 years since the adoption of the Constitution Congress has passed about 24,000 acts, of which only 64 have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, leaving 23,936 held constitutional or as to which no constitutional question went to the Supreme Court.

Of those 64 opinions in 147 years more than half of them were by unanimous vote of the Court. Of the 64 only 11 were by a 5-to-4 vote. Of those 64 cases there are only 10 of great public importance, and as to them I do not think anyone can say with any assurance whatever that the American people, on a direct referendum, would have repealed the decision of the Supreme Court in a single case. Yet the Supreme Court in that long period of time has decided 40,000 cases, but because one or two do not meet with the views of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK], because the Supreme Court once or twice out of 40,000 cases has miscalled the play at the home plate, he would abolish the umpire or reverse his decision by the clamor of the bleachers rooting for the "home team."

Now, my time is short. There is much more I should like to say on this subject.

The distinct proposal of the gentleman from Texas to deprive at least lower Federal judges of the power to pass upon legislative acts, in my judgment is one of the most dangerous proposals that was ever made in this country. What does it mean? It means that the doors of the lower Federal courts of this Nation will be closed by Mr. MAVERICK to the citizens of the United States to protect their constitutional rights; and what does that mean? It means in practice and effect that the poor man is forbidden from asserting his constitutional rights in the courts of his country. How much does it cost to carry a case to the Supreme Court of the United States in lawyers' fees, printing of the record and briefs, and court costs? Often thousands of dollars. How many poor men can afford to take their cases to the Supreme Court of the United States to have their rights there protected for the first time? The gentleman's proposal came from "a man of zeal but without understanding." He does not prevent the Du Ponts and the "princes of privilege" from going to the Supreme Court. They can pay their way there. They can hire lawyers. They can pay for their records and briefs. Their constitutional rights are not to be deprived by the gentleman from Texas, but he is going to close the Federal courts of this country, in all practical effect, to thousands and thousands of the poor and humble from asking the protection of their constitutional guarantees.

In the words of a great Virginian, "I know not what course others may take, but as for me", if and when the American people decide to destroy the power of the judiciary of this country to pass upon acts of legislative bodies, and decide to relegate the Supreme Court to the basement of our governmental structure, then on that day I shall willingly leave this Chamber of my colleagues, as the only poor protest I can then make against a course of action, which, in my judgment, will destroy much of that which has made this America of ours the land we love. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] has expired.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Under leave to extend my remarks, may I add the following to what I have said orally:

The gentleman from Texas argues that the Court should take a "liberal" or "enlightened" view of the Constitution. I claim to be a liberal because, when the Court has divided, the views expressed by such Judges as Brandeis, Holmes, and Cardozo often more nearly coincide with my poor opinion in the matter than that of the majority from which they dissent. But in asking the Court to be liberal the request or demand is utterly meaningless unless you go on and state who, in your judgment, the Court should be liberal toward—the Nation or the States; the Government or the citizen.

How would my friend from Texas have the Court construe the ninth and tenth amendments of the Constitution, the one providing that "the enumeration of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people", and the other "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution * * * are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people"?

If I understand my friend from Texas, he does not want the Court to give a liberal interpretation to these provisions of the Constitution. On the contrary, these provisions of the Constitution are to be construed strictly, and it is only the powers granted to Congress which are to be construed liberally. In other words, what the gentleman intends is not that the Court shall construe the Constitution liberally but rather that it should adopt and write into their opinions the nationalist attitude rather than the State rights point of view in interpreting the Constitution. The gentleman from Texas has become a Hamiltonian.

Whether the power of the States over their local affairs, which have been safeguarded to them by the ninth and tenth amendments, should be taken away from them and vested in the Federal Government, is a question we will apparently have to decide; and I am a good enough American and a good enough believer in government by the consent of the people to live happily under any form of government which the American people, with full knowledge of the facts and with ample opportunity to deliberate, decide that they want to have.

I do want to say, however, that there is a lot of pseudo-liberalism floating around. A movement toward the center and toward the concentration of power at a single point or in a few hands may or may not be justified by the march of economics, but it cannot be described as a "liberal" movement.

The warning voices of every sage and patriot and the teaching of every page of history, ancient or modern, prove that this is so.

Let me quote one man. When the turbulent tides now tossing shall have come to rest and impartial history shall place a just appraisal upon men now prominent in the headlines of the daily press, I believe it will be held that Sam Gompers was the wisest leader that labor ever had. I quote from a speech by him not many years ago before a convention of the American Federation of Labor. He said:

> I believe there is no man to whom I would take second position in my loyalty to the Republic of the United States, and yet I would not give it more power over the individual citizenship of our country. * * * If I were in the minority of one in this convention, I would want to cast my vote so that the men of labor shall not willingly enslave themselves to Government authority in their industrial effort for freedom. * * * Let the future tell the story of who is right or who is wrong, who has stood for freedom, and who has been willing to submit their fate industrially to the Government.

Upon this question of a liberal construction of the Constitution it is worth noting that some of the most bitter criticism of the Supreme Court has come because, as charged, they did not construe constitutional provisions strictly enough. I refer particularly to the decisions restricting the powers of the State under the fourteenth amendment. It was, for example, a broad or liberal interpretation of the fourteenth amendment rather than a strict one under which the Supreme Court decided the minimum wage case of last spring.

It was Justice Holmes who once said: "There is nothing I more deprecate than the use of the fourteenth amendment beyond the absolute compulsion of its words to prevent the making of social experiments by the States."

The gentleman from Texas talks about child labor. That is an evil where it exists, and it seems to me that the gentleman from Texas could take time out from his criticism of the Federal courts and go down before the legislature of his native State and urge it to ratify the child-labor amendment of the Federal Constitution which has been on its doorstep for 13 years. I am not here criticizing Texas. The legislature of that great State has the same right to ratify or disapprove that amendment as any other State in the Nation, but to the extent that child labor may be an evil, my friend might well address his remarks to his State legislature rather than to ask the Supreme Court and the Congress by tortured construction of the Constitution to impose Federal child-labor legislation upon the people of his State, against their will, and without amending the Constitution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AUTOMOBILE STRIKES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order previously established, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hand to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution which I will ask unanimous consent to have read and considered after I have finished my remarks.

I also ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman may have permisison to revise and extend his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL], whose district adjoins mine, I am almost sorry I am not his kind of a Democrat; and I think there are some gentlemen here from Illinois who feel about the same way I do. I refer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

This question of the Constitution is one that we all like to hear discussed by those who possess the requisite knowledge to do so intelligently. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled, in my humble judgment, to the thanks of every Member of this House who believes in our form of government for his clear and correct statement of the facts and the law made in answer to the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

There is another question, however, which is of equal importance, one which must be solved now. I do not mean it must be solved in the years to come, but that it must be solved within the next few weeks or, at most, the next few months. It is a practical question and upon its correct solution depends our future form of government. We have heard for the last 4 years that unless we adopted this, that, or the other legislation we would have a revolution in this country. No doubt all the Members during the last week have had on their desks pamphlets, or bills, or propaganda of some kind, such as the housing pamphlets from New York, which told us that unless we appropriated money and adopted certain legislation we would have riots in the slum districts of the city of New York. To put it differently, the word comes to us: "Now you do this, or else——." You are all familiar with the phrase.

I am calling attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that today in Michigan there exists a situation where there is already at hand all of the elements which go into a revolution, all of the elements which make for civil war. We already have had violence, and we have on each side of this controversy, which must be settled, armed forces; and when I say armed forces, I mean armed forces; I mean men armed with guns, with bushels of hinges—strange implements but effective—stones, brick, pieces of hose in one end of which has been poured melted lead or babbitt metal—things of that kind—all ready to do battle.

The unfortunate thing about it is that the real issue, the real point that we must solve, is lost sight of in the discussion of the propriety of the statements and the attitude taken by the leaders on either side and by Government officials. To go back a moment. This sit-down strike is something new in this country. These men over at Flint, following that strike in the Bendix plant at South Bend, in the district of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL], who just spoke—following that strike these men at Flint thought they would try it. We have no reason to doubt the newspaper information, the news reports, as to the conditions which are said to exist. We who come from Michigan have no reason to doubt the word of people there whom we know, people who live in these towns, men who work in the factories—we have no reason to doubt their statements. We know they are good citizens. They tell us—and we have the letters here, and I shall ask permission to put part of them in the RECORD in an extension of my remarks—they tell us that not over 10 percent, and probably only 5 percent, of the men in those factories want to strike. They tell us that some of those sit-down strikers get out of the factories and go home, because they do not want to continue on strike, are sent for, are brought back to the factories by men not from Flint, not from Detroit, not from Michigan, but by men, union organizers, who come from Ohio and from other States, some from as far south as Atlanta, Ga.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not now.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that there is coercion on the part of General Motors. For General Motors I hold no brief. We who come from Michigan and who know the facts say that there is coercion on the other side. If information that is true to the facts is to be given to the House so that we can do our part under the police power to legislate to wipe out the conditions which cause these strikes and render it impossible for them to occur again, then an investigation by a regular or a special committee of the House to ascertain the facts is all that is necessary, if the Department of Labor does not already have the information. I notice in the newspaper reports, however, that the Secretary of Labor has sent her agents into the field to find what the facts may be. For this purpose, I have here a privileged resolution calling upon Miss Perkins as Secretary of Labor to give us certain information.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Do I understand that these men are still in the shops contrary to orders of the company owners?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. Do I further understand that the circuit judge of that district issued a mandatory decree authorizing and directing the sheriff of that county to remove these men?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman from Michigan tell us why this order has not been carried out?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I can only give the gentleman my idea. I have no authority to speak for anyone; but, having practiced law for something over 38 years, I presume that General Motors desire to let the situation go on until the people in Flint, in Detroit, and in the surrounding towns know what it means to have these factories closed, and to have opinion in these towns crystalized on the question as to whether a small percentage of the workers should be upheld in their efforts to close these factories and other factories dependent upon these body plants for production until General Motors recognized the C. I. O. as the sole bargaining agency.

I might add that the injunction or mandatory order of the court, requiring, as I understand it, the strikers to leave the plant, was served by the sheriff on the sit-down strikers, who refused to obey the order and remained in possession; that General Motors, hoping to avoid violence and undoubtedly hoping for a reasonable solution, refrained from demanding of the sheriff and Governor the enforcement of the court's decree.

Unfortunately the judge who issued this injunction owned stock in General Motors. The papers today inform us that new proceedings have been filed, which will be heard by another judge. This petition for a mandatory injunction will be heard next Monday. At that time General Motors will ask for an order ousting these men. The paper also tells us these men have been discharged by General Motors and are no longer employees. What has been the past situation? The prosecuting attorney of that county, who is a Democrat—a good one and a good citizen besides—issued warrants for the arrest of these men. He called upon the sheriff to serve those warrants. The sheriff was ready and willing to serve them. But what happened? The Governor of the State called out over 2,000 of the National Guard and said he would not permit violence. In other words, if the men would not go out willingly, if they would not accept service and come out with the sheriff and answer the charges made against them, the National Guard would prevent violence in the service of those warrants.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Do I understand now that the gentleman from Michigan is directly charging the Governor of the State of Michigan with sending troops there in the form of the National Guard for the sole purpose of protecting the men who are the sit-down strikers in those shops?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I do not charge the Governor with sending in troops for that purpose. I do say, and I do not believe it can be contradicted, that that is the result of his action. That is all I say. He sent them in, so he said, to preserve order; but men were in the factory and what could be the effect? Suppose I came to your house. I go in. You are away from home. You come home and you want me out and the sheriff says, "No touch."

Mr. LUCAS. Have the troops sent in there by the Governor used any force or persuasion or any method of any kind in attempting to remove the men?

Mr. HOFFMAN. My understanding is they have taken no part whatever. They have remained absolutely neutral.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I wonder if the gentleman is in position to give the House some information as to why the Secretary of Labor has had such poor success thus far in accomplishing anything in the way of bringing the two contending forces together? Is there any prejudice in labor circles or a lack of interest from other sources in the Secretary which means that her battles are lost before being commenced?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I would say so far as Michigan is concerned, and so far as the men in the factories of General Motors are concerned, the opinion would be her battles were won before they were started. That her decisions would be in labor's favor. What she asked Mr. Sloane to do, if I read the news correctly, was to come down here and go into this conference without his shirt. He was to negotiate while his opponent held possession of the factories. He said he would come down here if these men would get out of the factory, but they said, "No."

The situation in Michigan was one pregnant with trouble. In an effort to aid in settling the differences existing between General Motors and the sit-downers, Governor Murphy called for a conference at Lansing, and at that conference it was agreed that motor officials would meet at Detroit with representatives of the C. I. O. in an attempt to lay a foundation for negotiations to end the difficulty, on condition that the strikers evacuate the plants before the holding of the conference.

In Flint a large number of the employees of the motor industry did not belong to the C. I. O. There were some who were members of the American Federation of Labor and there were others who did not belong to any union organization.

This latter group formed an organization known as the Flint Alliance, composed of employees of the motor industry, business and professional men, merchants, and others in Flint, practically all of whom were dependent upon the motor industry for their livelihood.

They did not desire to be represented in the settlement of the controversy by the C. I. O., and they asked that their interests be considered in any negotiations.

Upon receipt of their request, Knudsen, of General Motors, advised that the company was willing to hear them. This fact becoming known to the officials of the C. I. O., evacuation of the plants was discontinued and negotiations were broken off.

The Governor of Michigan being unable to get the parties together, the controversy came to Washington, and the Secretary of Labor called for a conference. Union officials, officials of General Motors, came to Washington.

Then John L. Lewis, the man behind the C. I. O. and the man behind the sit-down strike, made his famous demand, which was, in substance, that labor having contributed so largely to the campaign fund and to the election of the President, it now called upon him to decide the issue in labor's favor, and he further stated that no settlement would be satisfactory unless the C. I. O. was recognized as the sole bargaining agency.

Getting this report through the newspapers, Sloan, president of General Motors, standing upon the principle that his company would not abandon those of their employees who were not members of the C. I. O., left the city and negotiations were at an end.

The Secretary of Labor then invited all to return for a conference. Union officials accepted. Sloan stood upon the principle that, until the company's property was restored to it, it would not negotiate. But he announced his willingness to meet in conference, if requested by the President.

The President characterized this refusal as unfortunate and intimated, if press dispatches be true, that the request from the Secretary was equivalent to a request from the President himself.

The President may have so understood it. Sloan evidently did not, and he certainly would be a traitor to those of his employees, who far outnumber members of the C. I. O., if he sold them down the river to that organization. It is not only his legal right but his moral duty to protect them if they desire protection.

It is extremely doubtful that Madam Perkins speaks on all labor questions for the President. We doubt if he has approved her course in the past when she disregarded the deportation laws.

Madam Perkins condones the sit-down strike. She contends that, while it may not be legal, it is justifiable. The President has not yet gone that far, and we are certain that he has not forgotten that solemn oath which he took just a few short days ago to defend the rights guaranteed under the Constitution of these United States.

Madam Perkins' invitation to Sloan was to come into this conference without his shirt, to negotiate while the C. I. O. held part of the company's property. He declined to come under those conditions. He insisted upon the protection guaranteed to him by the law of the land and by common justice. He refused to recognize those who were withholding the company's property or to negotiate with them until they recognized the company's right to the possession of the property, the ownership and the possession of which was not disputed.

Columnists and editorial writers, forgetting the original issue, and to some extent the real one now involved, have devoted considerable space to a discussion of the propriety and the advisability of the various steps taken by these officials.

The fourteenth amendment provides that no State shall—

> Deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

To those who dislike the Constitution, who find it hampering and restrictive, cumbersome and out of date, let me for the moment repeat that, regardless of the provisions of Federal and State Constitutions, of Federal and State statutes, Executive orders or opinions of attorney generals, there are certain inalienable rights, based upon justice, which, the application of common sense convinces us, must be preserved if the well-being of the so-called underprivileged or the man who, throughout the history of the world, has been a producer and borne the burden of government, wars, and famines is to be preserved.

Throwing aside all sophistry, technical distinctions, and superficial argument, every man, deep down in his heart, who has a sense of justice and the power of reasoning, knows that the right to work, to earn property, to hold and to enjoy it, is absolutely necessary if there is to be organized society. Any failure to protect this right can only result in riot, bloodshed, and chaos.

It should need no argument to bring us to this conclusion. Even the most muddled thinking of the ardent partisan cannot confuse the issue if we look at the problem honestly, fairly.

Madam Perkins bases her justification for the sit-down strike upon the declaration that, under this complicated economic and industrial system which has developed, a man has the right to work. This, assuming that a man must work to live, is an appeal to the law of necessity.

It, however, ignores the fact that not one man but all are entitled to the right of work and that the sit-down strike, which is called for the purpose of giving one group the right to work under conditions imposed by them, ignores and disregards the right of all others to work under conditions which may be agreeable to the latter group.

In the case of the present strikes, where the vast majority desires to continue in its present employment, it is the application of the doctrine that the privileged few shall dominate the many, a direct repudiation of the President's utterances.

Mr. COX. That brings me back to my original question. What is it that is lacking in the Secretary's technique which makes it impossible for her seemingly to get anywhere?

Mr. HOFFMAN. How do I know what a Democratic Secretary of Labor is thinking? How do I know whether the C. I. O. feels that she owes them a debt or whether those opposed to their demands distrust her? I only remember that she did not enforce the deportation laws.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. Does not the gentleman feel that the Governor of the State of Michigan has done a most admirable job so far as the State government is concerned with regard to the strike situation?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I hope the gentleman will excuse me from answering that question, because I do not want to criticize any Democratic State official, and I want to remain truthful, if I can.

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman has intimated as much.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Intimated what?

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman has intimated as much when he said the Governor brought in troops for the purpose of stopping the service of court papers.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I did not say that. If I said that, I misspoke myself. What I meant to say was that was the result of bringing in the troops, and when the Governor requested the prosecuting attorney and the sheriff of the county to withhold service of the warrant, you can see where we were.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, if we should put this gentleman, the Republican doorkeeper, up here in the Speaker's chair and if we said to this fine majority over here, these intelligent, self-sacrificing men who labor so hard day after day to serve their country, "Boys, you are through until you do what we want done", what would happen to us?

Now, we want the same rule, the same principle, applied over there in Michigan.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman impresses me as wanting to be very careful in his expressions. I respect the gentleman for that, and I respect him in other ways as well. But I think he unconsciously made a statement which might be construed as a criticism against Governor Murphy. I do not care whether the Governor is a Democrat or Republican. He is the Governor of a great Commonwealth of the Union. Let me ask the gentleman a question in order to clear up the record, so that there will be no mistake or misunderstanding. If my friend the gentleman from Michigan, who is now addressing the House, were Governor of the State of Michigan, having in mind the circumstances that exist there, would the gentleman in all probability take the same action that Governor Murphy took when he sent the troops into Flint?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman, by his hypothetical statement, confers an undue honor upon me, but I will answer the question by saying this: So help me God, had I been in the executive office in Lansing when these fellows sat down in that factory, knowing as I would that there were 10 to 1 on the outside who wanted to work and could not work because these men were inside keeping the workers out, unlawfully retaining possession, and had the prosecuting attorney of that county issued warrants, valid on their face, I would have given the sheriff of that county, as did Grover Cleveland in his time, the authority to enforce the law. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. I have no controversy with the gentleman——

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know it.

Mr. McCORMACK. And as to the sit-down strike, I think it is very unwise, and the gentleman from Massachusetts personally does not approve of it, but eliminating, as I have said, the fact of a Democratic Governor or a Republican Governor and having in mind the circumstances that existed at that particular time and assuming everything the gentleman has said is true, and agreeing with all of it, is it my understanding that the gentleman wants the RECORD to show that Governor Murphy sent the troops in there to protect these sit-down strikers in their policy?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. I have tried to answer that question, and I do not want any misunderstanding about that. I am not talking politics today.

Mr. McCORMACK. If I thought my friend was talking politics, I would not ask the question. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. I thank the gentleman.

My point was that I think that was the result. I am not questioning the motives of the Governor of our State. Let us have the record clear on that. He will answer to our people as to the wisdom of his action. I am only trying to say what the result has been and where we stand today; and due to the fact that the Flint Alliance came into this conference in Detroit and the motor officials said they would hear them and would not accept Lewis or his organization as the sole bargaining agency, we got into this mess, and then they came down here and the Secretary of Labor, with the highest motives, we will say, if you wish, tried to solve the problem, and she asked Mr. Sloan down here and she asked the others, and then Mr. Lewis came along, and if he did not make the statement in so many words, the substance of his statement was that the President owed him a political debt. Now, I do not recognize any such thing.

Mr. McCORMACK. So the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be clear, my questions were not for the purpose of trying to place my friend from Michigan in any embarrassing position——

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know that.

Mr. McCORMACK. But were for the purpose of trying to clarify the record so that the position of the gentleman would be clearly understood and there would be no possibility of any misunderstanding.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman speaks of the result of the action of Governor Murphy in handling this situation. Is not the gentleman in favor of settling a strike by peaceful means rather than by violence?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Why, certainly; but I am not in favor of 5 percent of the workers getting on top of the other 95 percent, preventing that 95 percent from working by holding possession of the workshop and the tools and then saying, "Let us not fight."

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. What does the gentleman advocate being done with the 5 percent or 10 percent? What can be done with them?

Mr. HOFFMAN. What can be done with them?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Yes; let him answer that question.

Mr. HOFFMAN. In the first place, they have absolutely no legal right in the factory, have they? No one contends that they have. Now, throw away all your Federal and all your State constitutional rights and privileges, throw out of consideration all the statutes, Executive orders, and everything else, and every one of us here today knows that this right to work, which Madame Perkins says is a personal right, or I think the way she put it was that it was a property right and should be guaranteed, and then tell me what right this 10 percent or 5 percent have to deprive the other 90 percent of their right to work in order to support their families and to throw all of them, strikers and all, back on the general public for support out of relief funds.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman will admit that the people engaged in a sit-down strike in these factories were brought in there and employed by the proprietors of these factories, were they not?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Sure. They have since been discharged.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. But they were there at their invitation and solicitation?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; they were there in the beginning at their invitation.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. And that was their place of employment?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; and when they got through their day's work it was their business to go home until it was time for the next shift.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. And they are now engaged in a strike for better wages and living conditions.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There is no question of better wages, living conditions, hours of employment involved in this particular strike. The only issue is on the demand of the C. I. O. to be recognized as the sole bargaining agency for all employees, whether they are members of that organization or not.

Has it not been the doctrine of the President all the way through that the privileged few should not exploit the many; and would you have this 5 or 10 percent keep the others out of employment and put them on the relief rolls? Is that what the gentleman advocates? That is not the President's attitude.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I am simply trying to get the facts.

Mr. HOFFMAN. All right; what does the gentleman want to know?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I want to know what the gentleman advocates doing with this 5 or 10 percent of the employees.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Throw them out of the factory and let the other 90 or 95 percent go to work.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. At the outset of the gentleman's remarks he stated that both sides were armed and that all of the elements that make for revolution were present in this particular controversy at the present time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman think that the action of the Governor of his State was honestly motivated by a sincere desire to avert the very trouble that the gentleman has spoken of in his remarks here today?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Undoubtedly his idea was to prevent bloodshed down there and to prevent violence, but what has been the result?

A condition has been brought about which is much worse than the original situation. The thousands who have been deprived of their jobs, of their wages mounting into the millions, because of the arbitrary, unlawful, and unfair action of this small percentage of strikers, are becoming impatient. There were 8,000 in one group who desired to work, but could not do so because a few held possession of these factories.

Your paper today tells you of 31 in a plant at Akron, Ohio, causing a shut-down of industries which affects the jobs of 10,000 men.

Mr. HEALEY. Aside from that, does not the gentleman think the action of the Governor was commendable in exhausting every possible means to prevent violence or bloodshed?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No more so than if I should strike you and keep on striking you and then have someone hold you and prevent you from retaliating.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Part of this situation exists in my home town and there are hundreds or thousands out of employment there. The gentleman from Michigan does not mean to say that General Motors is using its influence to prolong this strike situation so that the people will appreciate the value of operating its plants in these communities. The gentleman does not mean to say that?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I do not mean that; they wanted to avoid any hasty action; they wanted to avoid doing anything which would bring on violence. Undoubtedly they thought that after a while the thing would crystallize and people would understand the situation—they would find the number that wanted to work and the number that did not and the matter would be settled peacefully.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The company feeling that way, they did not agitate the enforcement of the service of papers.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; they did not insist upon the service of the warrants or a compliance with the injunction. They were patient. They evidently hoped the trouble would be settled without either violence or court action.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And the real question is whether the minority shall have, in addition to the right to organize and the exclusive right to collective bargaining, the right to take over the company's property against all constituted authority.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is a very real question, which requires a solution which will be practicable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 2 minutes more in order that I may ask a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman made the statement about the right of property, is not the sit-down strike a right upheld by the Federal courts of this country?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know of any Federal or State decision to the effect that one man may go on another man's property and deny him the right to enjoy that property. In fact if I remember correctly the fourteenth amendment provides that no State shall deprive any citizen of equal protection under the law. The right to work is not only a property right, it is as well, a personal right. Why should not that 90 percent have their personal right to work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Will not the gentleman agree that in the last 50 years the prosperity of the country was based on the privilege and right to strike by organized labor, and if they did not have that we would have a peonage system as they have in some other parts of the country?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman is pointing to the South—I am not throwing any stones.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. In Minnesota we do not shoot people by the militia.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; you sandbag them on the highway. [Laughter.] I recall that you had violence and bloodshed in Minnesota; that you had strikes which for months tied up practically all business in some of your principal cities.

More recent news dispatches bring us the information that thousands of workers in Flint, who are out of employment solely because the factories where they work are occupied and shut down because of these strikes, are demanding the right to work.

Representatives of the Flint Alliance, which numbers some 30,000, asked the Governor of Michigan whether he would protect those who desired to work in going to and from their work, and this assurance, if the news dispatches of this morning are correct, the Governor has refused to give.

There is, if the reports, which we have no reason to question, be true, in the State of Michigan armed, open rebellion against the enforcement of the law.

We also learn through the press and over the radio that violence has broken out; that union organizers have been roughly handled. The situation is one where, unless the orderly process of the law be followed, there will be bloodshed and civil war, and about this there is no question.

Where hundreds of men come in from outside the State and prevent the workers of Michigan from going to their usual places of employment and taking up their daily tasks, and where the burden of supporting these unemployed workers is thrown back upon the merchants and others of the local community, where practically all business is brought to a standstill, it is certain that sooner or later, legal relief being denied, the worker will take the law into his own hands.

In Flint there are several hundred strikers within the plants, armed with blackjacks, with heavy pieces of metal, with clubs, and other means of defending themselves. These men are determined at all hazards to hold possession of the plants.

On the outside are several thousand would-be workers, with like means of offensive warfare at their command, equally determined to return to their usual places of employment.

The situation needs but a leader in this latter group to bring on riot, bloodshed, and, locally, civil war. We all remember the bloodshed on the west coast. We remember the strikes of the farmers, the blocking of the highways, the pouring of milk in the roadside ditches.

Within a week we have learned that 250 employees in the city of New York threatened to deprive 2,000,000 people of light and transportation; that in the city of Chicago a small group, for a short period, tied up traffic.

There is but one solution to this present difficulty, and that is:

First. The enforcement of the law through the courts and the executive department of State and Nation.

Second. The incorporation of all labor organizations, making them equally responsible, with employers and employer organizations, under the law, for the carrying out of their contracts, the payment of damages for the violation of such contracts.

Third. The enactment, under the police power of State and Federal Government, of laws which will protect health, which will guarantee continuity of employment, and a living wage.

Fourth. And over and above all, the thought that, after all, we must live together in this land of ours; that, while business should and must cooperate, as the President has requested, in giving employment, it can only create jobs, and continue to give employment, if it is permitted to operate upon an economic basis.

While labor must have a living wage, those with the wealth and the ability to organize and operate industrial plants must also have the opportunity to make a profit. Otherwise, we must have Government ownership and regulation of all business.

With government in control in the end, labor might find, to its sorrow, as it did in those days of old, that it can be commanded to make bricks without straw.

The granting of the recent request of the Secretary of Labor for power to subpena witnesses is wholly unnecessary. There is no reason why she should be sent upon a fishing expedition. She has agents already in the strike area. So has another department of the Government.

Let her submit so much of the information requested in the resolution which I have introduced as may now be in her possession and, if she lacks information, this House can order an investigation, either by a regular or a special committee.

It can call witnesses from both sides; it can inquire, not only as to the activities and contributions made by industry to combat the demands of organized labor, but it can, as well, ascertain the source from which come the funds to pay organizers. It can inquire into the activities of those organizers. Then submit all the facts, with recommendations, to Congress and thus furnish us with a basis for the suggested legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the unanimous consent previously granted, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] for 20 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I know how inadequate may be my assistance to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], but some 3 weeks ago I suggested on the floor that there were certain economic forces at work that would surely become very potent during the next few years. One of them seems to have been suddenly released upon us, and I make the appeal that we ought to do by democratic methods what others are doing by coercion and by force. I cannot expect the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] to get any help from the Democratic side of the aisle. The President is the whole Democratic Party, and it is unfortunate that I must refer to him when I should prefer to talk about the responsibility of the majority party. Particularly is this true in these days of trial through which he is passing, and especially during these last few days when his attention must be fixed on flood conditions. But he has an adversary today. A famous newspaper editor said that you could save 1,000 words by showing a picture. Just look at this picture of this man. Does he look as if he would listen to any lullabies?

The day after the inauguration of the President, Mr. John L. Lewis issued a statement, and I think a few of these words should go into the RECORD as part of the sequences when this matter is seriously taken up later on. The following is from a press report:

> We have advised the administration through the Secretary of Labor and the Governor of Michigan that for 6 months economical royalists, represented by General Motors, du Ponts, Sloan, and others, contributed their money and used their energy to drive the President of the United States out of Washington and this administration out of power. The administration asked labor to help it repel this attack, and labor did help the President to repel the economic royalists. These same economic royalists now have their fangs in labor, and labor expects the administration to support the automobile workers in every legal way in their fight. Labor is on the march in this country toward those better things and better times so eloquently described from time to time by the President of the United States.

The President of the United States, upon being questioned by the press, made this cryptic statement, which could be quoted, and hinted certainly that it could be properly analyzed:

> I think in the interest of peace there come moments when statements, conversations, and headlines are not in order.

I doubt if he would approve my making any conversation on this subject this afternoon. I come from an industrial section, and we wish to know whether a sit-down strike is legal or not. When Mr. Sloan refused to come here he issued a statement as follows:

> To All Employees of General Motors Corporation:
> On January 5 I told you the circumstances that had resulted in our having to close certain of our plants and curtail the operations of others. Many things have since been said. In the conflict of statements and happenings there is much confusion. And now I want to make clear just what has happened and what the situation is today.
> Three weeks have passed. During that time we have earnestly striven to do everything possible to develop negotiations with the group that has attacked us in the hopes of reaching a satisfactory solution that will protect the interests of all involved and enable you to go back to work. That is what you want. And it is our most earnest desire.
> During these 3 weeks you have in many different ways demonstrated your loyalty and satisfaction. I appreciate your confidence. It means more to me than anything else, for I am deeply concerned with the situation in which we find ourselves. Over 100,000 have signified their desire to return to work.
> I told you before, and you yourself have always known, that you are deprived of the right to work by a small minority who have seized certain plants and are holding them as ransom to enforce their demands.
> The leader of this group has, as you know, publicly stated that hours, wages, and conditions of employment are not involved. Now, what is involved? It is this: That we should turn you over, body and soul, for exploitation. This is demonstrated by the demand that they be given the exclusive privilege of acting as representatives of all our workers, regardless of your desires. This has always been perfectly clear.
> I say to you once more, have no fear. Do not be misled. General Motors will never let you down.
>
> Now, here is where we stand:
> 1. We propose to demonstrate that these trespassers, who have seized our plants and who have taken from you the privilege of working, have not the right to do so.
> 2. We shall demand that your rights and our rights be protected.
> 3. We will negotiate with this group and will earnestly strive for an honorable settlement as soon as the illegal seizure of our plant is terminated.
> 4. We believe in giving every group an opportunity to be heard. There is nothing to justify our doing otherwise.
> 5. You will not have to pay tribute for the privilege of working in a General Motors plant.
> Efforts have been made to make you believe that General Motors is responsible for the break down of negotiations; that we refuse to meet with representatives of our own employees; that we are shirking our moral responsibility; that we have no respect for the public interest.
> You know this is not true. So why all these charges? Simply because we refuse to negotiate with a group that holds our plants for ransom without regard to law or justice, thus depriving over 100,000 of our peaceful and law-abiding employees of their inherent right to work. That is the reason and the only reason.
> ALFRED P. SLOAN, Jr.

Secretary Perkins invited him to come, and the President is quoted as saying, in effect, "She is my representative, and an invitation from her is equivalent to an invitation to come to the White House." If she is his representative, did she represent him when she said recently that a sit-down strike has not yet been determined illegal? Has it a legalistic status? Every schoolboy in the Nation knows that it is not legal. There may have been originated, as some of you will argue, an idea that labor has acquired a moral right by contributing its part in an industrial undertaking, and that therefore this ought to be interpreted to mean that they have gained a foothold on the actual property. But that question must be decided by the courts. I listened, as did you, very carefully to the President when he took his oath. Did you not hear the inflection of his voice toward the latter part of that oath, when he promised to "defend" the Constitution? He put particular emphasis upon that word. It seemed as though he meant to defend it, even if unsatisfactorily interpreted. When the injunction shall have been issued it will have become the duty of the Governor to eject these people, and finally, if the matter goes to the Supreme Court, the President of the United States must defend its decision.

What right has John L. Lewis to make demands of the President? As one editor put it recently, "Has he a mortgage on the soul of the President?" I think not. I shall read now from one of these editorials. These are not my words. I do not put myself forward as having authority or the ability to judge the situation. But in the course of a rather wide reading lately I have gathered many excerpts from the writings of those who have been giving thought to the subject. These opinions ought to be brought to our attention. If we are to meet the situation, we should inform ourselves. I know of no other way.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not yield. I present the following excerpt from a widely read magazine:

Observers saw in Lewis' words that the C. I. O. was out to collect payment for the campaign contributions. Originally stated to have been $458,418.91, insiders now believe that $1,100,000 is nearer the sum dumped into Democratic coffers by labor.

Another $500,000 is said to have been collected by Lewis to organize steel, a similar sum to fight the automotive industry battle. This money, according to usually well-informed sources, was raised through involuntary assessments on members of the United Mine Workers, which Lewis personally controls. Although Washington commentators declined to be definite, they hinted much of these contributions came from workers on relief.

The figures must have been carefully compiled. Their apparent exactness so indicates.

Although the Washington commentators declined to be definite, they hinted much of these contributions came from workers on relief.

Why do we have to hint? Can anyone doubt it?

I spoke of these economic forces. They worry me. They should worry you. Some newspapers seem to express surprise that the collection of the debt is now demanded. Before election these same newspaper editors, from all over this country, were emphatically stating to you that these demands would be made as soon as the election was over. It can be no surprise to you. Labor largely supported Mr. Roosevelt in the recent election. He went to Detroit and there condemned "entrenched greed and economic royalists." Labor has a right to feel that he should be with them in this fight. In all probability they cheerfully taxed themselves for that enormous contribution to his party.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Not now. I have not been very fortunate in getting people on the gentleman's side of the House to yield to me lately. The gentleman will notice they do not like to yield to me.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not like to smile.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am glad the gentleman recognizes a smile. The gentleman will understand that a request to yield is often made in an effort to divert the speaker as he is about to clinch an argument.

To return to the question, we are not surprised, are we, that the demand has been made?

Speaking about economic forces, labor was with the President, as you must agree. In my own district, where the claim was current that the processing tax closed many of our textile mills, it was believed a year ago that labor felt rather bitterly toward your President. Yet in November 1936 they voted for him rather enthusiastically.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Not now. I wish to say to you that it appears, too, that your President had the support largely of the Communists. Of course, he did not want it. I am sure he did not want it. I do not criticize him for that, but I bring to your mind the economic conditions. The Communists knew, the Socialists knew, all knew that fertile ground was being prepared that could easily be inoculated later. Some of you may not believe I am a farmer, but I am.

Once I carefully prepared a piece of ground. I plowed under the oats. I plowed under the rye, and I took out all the weeds, and I got the soil in proper condition so that all I had to do was send for one peck of soil that had been taken from a field growing alfalfa, and that whole field was inoculated very easily.

Mr. HOUSTON. How big was the field?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, in my section you would not regard any field as large. But even 2 acres is large there. [Laughter.] But having in mind the plight of the farmers throughout much of the Nation, I feel that we really make more out of 2 acres than some of you make out of 50 acres. [Laughter.]

The General Motors people say they are ready to talk when the sit-down strikers are ejected; when their buildings that are now held for ransom are depopulated. But this gives Miss Perkins another chance to assert that they have lost the support of the public, as well as of labor, by their refusal. She wishes them to come to Washington and arrive at a happy solution before the sit-down phase of the question is settled. The administration apparently does not want to face the problem of the sit-down strike. I feel that the Governor has been most reasonable. He desired to prevent bloodshed. The company seems also to have been reasonable. They have made no demands for an injunction for several weeks.

We, from other industrial sections, want this thing settled. If a sit-down strike is legal, my workers undoubtedly want to know it, as well as the owners of the property. But a settlement must be hastened, lest the issue itself gets to the courts. Miss Perkins has sent up here a request of your leaders—to me it is a funny picture, since your leaders largely come from the Southern States of this Nation where labor leaders themselves generally receive rather shabby treatment. I can imagine that tar and feathers would be preferred.

I have visited that section. There are laborers of foreign extraction there. They are not wanted. Few, if any, leaders go down there to unionize labor. Your own leaders will doubtless come to the President's rescue in this particular case, but not because of any heartfelt sympathy for union labor dictation. It is to save your President, because your entire party structure must stand or fall with him. Someone has said that the masses of the people have been taught to bow down and worship when he says "my friends." When you mention the name "Hoover", they run to him and say, "Papa, save me." [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman any information as to what has become of the letter reported to have been sent by the Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, to the Democratic leaders in the House asking for additional power in connection with all these matters?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know; but I have several excerpts here quoting those leaders, saying it should have careful consideration and they will try to give it prompt consideration. I think they well know that any action of theirs trying to help this condition will be greatly criticized. There are relics of those who believe in the Constitution still in this House, and even on the Democratic side, as was demonstrated this afternoon.

There are, however, but few relics of the real Democratic Party left. Your principles are gone. Our party is small in numbers, but we still hold to some of our principles at least. Yours are all wrapped up in the New Deal. Whatever your President requests are your principles; his nod is your command. I have been here 15 years. I do not recognize even vestiges of the Democratic Party over there. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman is addressing himself to the industrial phase involved in this problem. My district is quite evenly divided between industry and agriculture. In the agricultural part we have great plants which process agricultural products, fruits, vegetables, sugar beets. Farm crops of this kind can never withstand a sit-down strike.

Keep that in mind. An industrial plant can close and pig iron will not deteriorate, but beans and peas and sugar beets and fruits will not await the settlement of a sit-down strike. If the gentleman will permit me to trespass further on his time, I say you had better give this thing serious consideration. It is something new in industry and agriculture.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman, of course, is simply enlarging the point. It can be demonstrated "reductio ad absurdum." You have only to call to mind a very few instances to make it so ridiculous, as I say, that any schoolboy can see it has no legalistic standing. That "legalistic" reference was probably a trial balloon sent up by the Secretary. Did the President ask her to send it up? Is she speaking for him and using that as a method to try our public opinion?

In my extension of remarks I shall include two or three more very short comments. I want to put in brief statements by others than myself. I call your attention to another commentator, who is very loyal to the President, Heywood Broun. He was a strong asset, was he not, to the President of the United States? Did you read what he wrote recently? I will regale you with some excerpts from one of his columns:

> I am obsessed by the same delusion as John L. Lewis. Something has snapped, because I cannot throw off the impression that there was recently an election and that one of the major issues concerned the right of workers to bargain collectively. Part of my delusion is a memory that Franklin Delano Roosevelt spoke vigorously in favor of protecting employees in their effort to organize.
> There is no evidence in the President's words that any such issue was recently decided by the people.
> That, then, is the great delusion of John L. Lewis. On the surface, at any rate, he seems convicted of being naive enough to believe that Franklin Roosevelt meant what he said.
> Something was said, wasn't it, about taking pride in the enmity of certain selfish groups?
> Of course, I must be wrong. Of course, no such notion animates Mr. Roosevelt at present. The problems of the land are to be settled by Mr. Sloan and other men of good will. Mr. Roosevelt purposes to remain completely neutral, although as yet he has neglected to make the traditional gesture of sending for a basin of water with which to wash his hands.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. With great pleasure.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does the gentleman favor the creation of a commission clothed with power to settle strikes and to look into industrial disputes?

Mr. GIFFORD. Have we not already created the National Labor Relations Board? Yet neither side dares bring it into use. They do not want the information, as the gentleman preceding me has stated.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is the gentleman willing to go far enough to give this commission power to subpena witnesses and bring in these industrial and labor leaders for purposes of conference and the furnishing of information as to the real facts?

Mr. GIFFORD. I say in the words of your own leaders, that such an important request, which is capable of so much abuse, should be granted very sparingly, if at all.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it the contention of the gentleman that the courts abuse such power?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I still believe in our Government and in our courts. I am not like a good many of the Members who, when the court does not agree with them, say that the court is wrong.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does not the gentleman believe that the people of the country have an interest in these labor disputes?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, the people of the country have the largest stake in these labor disputes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Then, carrying out that idea, does not the gentleman think that the constituted authorities should have the right to bring in these labor and industrial leaders by subpena, to bring in their books and records, and to let the public know what is involved in these disputes?

Mr. GIFFORD. Of course my answer is "yes." But after an election such as the last, when the Democratic Party accepted about $500,000 from an organization led by a man of such determination and who is now demanding payment, it is at the moment a serious question whether or not such power would be abused. I suggest the reading of the following excerpt:

> The answer is simply that the Government nowadays doesn't dare enforce the law or throw its influence openly on the side of the law, and the case is a graphic example of the change in the Government and in the apparent temper of the people.
> Lewis may yet lose the sit-down fight by a mere false move, but he don't lose it all even if he is licked, because the proposition is now calmly accepted that it is all right for a labor leader and a small group of workmen to defy the law if the opponent in the scrap is a soulless corporation.
> That much has been won already, and tacitly conceded by all governments. Thus it was before Mussolini and thus again before Hitler.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman is making a serious charge. Upon what does the gentleman base his statement that the Democratic Party accepted half a million dollars in this way?

Mr. GIFFORD. I read the statement showing they had contributed nearly $500,000. I read the exact amount, taken from a magazine, the good standing of which is well recognized. I am glad that the gentleman thinks it a serious charge, implying, as he does, that the contributions should not have been received.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman was simply quoting newspaper matter.

Mr. GIFFORD. Everybody has a right to his opinion as to its authority, and I challenge anyone to prove it false.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Aside from newspaper comment upon what does the gentleman base his statement?

Mr. GIFFORD. We get most of our information from the newspapers and the opinions of their special commentators. I do not know where the gentleman gets his, but I know where I have to get mine.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the gentleman complains that the labor unions contributed $500,000 to the Democratic campaign.

Mr. GIFFORD. I merely read the statement to the House without expressing any personal opinion.

Mr. HOUSTON. That was taken from the newspapers?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. How much did General Motors contribute to the Republican campaign fund?

Mr. GIFFORD. They had to contribute a lot. You had $5,000,000,000 of public money to start with.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman from Massachusetts made the statement that the Committee on Industrial Organization had contributed a half million dollars to President Roosevelt's campaign fund and that some of that money probably came from the workers on relief. What distinction does the gentleman draw between President Roosevelt getting money from workers on relief and Landon getting money from capitalists on relief?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Perhaps I did not need to answer the question.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman believe that the majority in this House would be willing to change the rules of the House in order that a sit-down strike of the minority on this side might be recognized? [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. May I answer the question by saying that the great majority over there, under the control of the leaders they have, will try their best to circumvent any action on this side. I can assure the gentlewoman from Massachusetts of that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

WILDLIFE CONSERVATION

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution No. 11.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 11

Resolved, That the special committee to investigate all matters pertaining to the replacement and conservation of wildlife is authorized to continue the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 237 of the Seventy-third Congress, and continued under authority of House Resolution 44 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon it by said House Resolution 237 of the Seventy-third Congress, and shall report to the House as soon as practicable, but not later than January 3, 1939, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations for necessary legislation. Any unexpended balance of the total amount authorized for the use of said special committee under House Resolution 263 of the Seventy-third Congress is hereby continued available until said date.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, at a later and more opportune time, when the House has not enjoyed such an extensive flow of wit and feast of reason as we have had today, I will welcome an opportunity to discuss at greater length than I feel justified in doing this afternoon the importance of the conservation of certain of our national resources. In my public life nothing has given me more pleasure nor greater satisfaction than the time I have spent in studying the national resources of a nation that has been richly endowed with such resources, and in working on ways and means of conserving those resources, providing for a fuller and better use thereof, and in working out plans to pass on to future generations some of the advantages we have enjoyed.

I wish to touch today on the economic phases only of the problem.

It is not generally known that our commercial fisheries, for instance, is a billion-dollar industry, and that the finished products, fisheries and fish products, retails annually for about $250,000,000. Yet this great industry is seriously threatened. The lobsters and the crabs of the North Atlantic coast, the salmon, the fish of the Great Lakes, the sardine industry of the Pacific coast, are all threatened.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I may say only this morning I received a communication from Boston. The biggest fish pier in the country, if not in the world, is located in my district. They have up there twenty-three and a half million pounds of frozen fish, which has glutted the market. Yesterday I introduced a bill to enable the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to do the same thing for the fish industry that we properly permit them to do for agriculture. What the gentleman says about the fish industry is absolutely correct, and I call his attention to this specific evidence which I obtained only today.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct. There has been no scientific management of this great resource, and I say it is threatened.

Our fur industry is in the same situation. Fifteen years ago the State of Maine alone furnished more mink skins than are now furnished by all 48 States combined. Our farm boys once derived a revenue of $65,000,000 from raw furs. That source of revenue has dropped to $20,000,000.

Last June there was introduced a bill providing for the study of stream pollution. Our committee found that about 85 percent of the streams in the thickly populated sections of this Nation are polluted in one way or another. This is a serious problem that has been overlooked, costing us millions of dollars every year in connection with the purification of water for drinking purposes alone.

Last year there was great complaint from many sections of the country with reference to the duck regulations. There is another great industry which gives employment to some 500,000 people. This employment is in addition to the pleasure that we get from the hunting of ducks and geese and the opportunity to go out to some concentration area and see great flocks of game in flight. That is an inspiration to every man. The supply of ducks is being threatened.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DISNEY. During this last fall we, in Oklahoma, received complaints from many of our sportsmen as to the zones fixed by the Biological Survey. In other words, there were no ducks to shoot in Oklahoma, because they had already gone before the open season fixed by the Biological Survey. Our sportsmen are not trying to destroy all the ducks, but they would like to get a shot at them once in a while. In Kansas, during the season fixed, they have had some shooting, but by the time the season, as fixed by the Survey, gets to us in Oklahoma all the ducks are down on the Gulf coast. I wonder if this resolution or something related to it will give us some place to complain. The Department wrote us very affable and polite letters, in which was the veiled suggestion that all we wanted to do was to destroy all the wild game. However, our sportsmen are just as patriotic as anyone else, and they think they should have a fair run for their alley. The climatic and geographic situations in Oklahoma and Kansas are comparable, but an arbitrary placing of Kansas—just adjoining us—in one zone and Oklahoma in another seems wholly unfair and impractical.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I recognize that what the gentleman says is correct. Some have complained about the zones. Others have complained against the regulations that prohibited any feeding at all.

In certain marshes where they have always fed you cannot hold the ducks without feeding and the owners of these marshes got no shooting last fall. One of the purposes of continuing this committee is to give a forum this year where those interested in the situation of our migratory birds may be heard with respect to seasons and bag limits and regulations which, under a general act of Congress, the Department of Agriculture has the power to promulgate with the force and effect of law.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to my colleague from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. As a member of the committee, I want to congratulate the speaker for the excellent work he has done. I also wish to call attention to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries are members of the Wildlife Committee, thus coordinating the activities of investigation with legislative responsibility with respect to the subject.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I thank my colleague, and I may say in this connection that it has been a pleasure for the members of the select committee to work with these other committees and, when called on by them, to make special investigations of subjects that would be of particular interest to us and which we would have more opportunity to study than the major committee.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. Getting back to the remarks made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY] about their days for hunting in Oklahoma, the gentleman states that this year the ducks were down on the Gulf before their hunting season opened. Just the reverse was true in Illinois. Having a mild winter, they got down in central Illinois, but never did get down into the southern section of the State until after our season had closed. So I have had a lot of complaints from landowners about their wheat being entirely destroyed by flocks of 50,000 or 100,000, with hundreds of acres being destroyed. It is one of the duties of this committee to conduct hearings and cooperate with the Biological Survey in an effort to determine the proper dates for the hunting season in the various States; and if this committee is continued, I understand it will perhaps be able to do something about this in conjunction with the Biological Survey.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It will be our purpose to hold some public hearings on that subject.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to my friend from California.

Mr. KRAMER. From my observation, the chairman of this select committee has done some very good work up to the present time. I understand the amount of the original appropriation was about $7,500. I do not know how much of this amount is still in the hands of the committee, but I assume the gentleman is going to ask for additional funds. Has the gentleman any idea how much additional money will be requested?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Certainly, no more than we originally asked for and on which we have operated for 3 years. We leave those matters largely to the Committee on Accounts. As the House knows, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts is a real economizer, just like the chairman of this select committee. He believes in economy and believes in doing as good a job as possible for as little money as possible, and I do not believe there has been a select committee of the House that has operated as economically as this committee. We have worked for 3 years with an original appropriation of only $7,500.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, in these 2 minutes I wish to mention the fact that our studies of the 16 agencies that in one way or another touch the problem of Federal conservation have laid the foundation for a part of the recommendation that has come to the Congress for consolidation of the conservation work of this Government. We have studied this problem. We have developed what these various agencies have done, and we have laid the foundation for what we believe will be a consolidation that will save the taxpayers money and give better results with respect to conservation. This is one thing we have done.

We have also given direction to some 30,000 or 40,000 employees of the Resettlement Administration engaged in expending a fund of about $90,000,000 for the purchase of some 9,000,000 acres of land to be used primarily for recreational and wildlife purposes.

We have seen to it that trained men were put in strategic places who knew something about the purposes for which this land was to be acquired and used.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Who makes the decision as to where these game refuges shall be or who selects such places?

Mr. ROBERTSON. They have three funds. One is an appropriation under the migratory bird treaty with Canada, one is from the duck stamp that our committee helped to get through, and out of which we have been realizing from $600,000 to $700,000 a year, and the third fund is from what they call the emergency fund. I do not know whether this is a P. W. A. or W. P. A. fund, but, whatever fund it is, it is a relief fund, and out of that fund the Biological Survey got $8,000,000. The Biological Survey locates the refuges.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. I appreciate the kindness of the gentleman from North Carolina, but there are others interested in this matter, and I want them to be heard. I want to thank the Republican members of the committee for their wholehearted support and for the fine work they have done. One thing that has always interested me in conservation is that it is a nonpolitical activity in which all can unite. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I might say for the benefit of the new Members of the House that this is a special standing committee that has been in existence 3 or 4 years to investigate the wildlife of this country with the object of coordinating a logical program for its development.

As already stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], we found that there were numerous departments of the Government carrying on work affecting the wildlife of this country. They were carrying on a program that was not coordinated. Some were carrying on work that destroyed the wildlife of the country while the Biological Survey was attempting to put on a program that would preserve the wildlife.

I think for the first time in the history of this House there was created a committee before whom representatives of the various departments could be invited, and the committee could ascertain from them just what they were doing. We endeavored to impress upon them the necessity of working out a coordinated program.

It is a well known fact to all of us who live in the West that some of the work carried on by some of the agencies of the Government has been absolutely destructive to wildlife. It is the hope of this committee that in the future due consideration will be given to the subject and that the conservation of the wildlife of this country will be kept constantly in mind by all agencies.

Reference has been made to the work that has been accomplished. I want to pay tribute to the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] and say that every cent has been well spent, and that not one dollar of the money made available to this committee has been used in needless expenditure. There have been no trips by the membership of this committee. We have brought in here to Washington the various witnesses at the hearings, and they have all been held in the House Office Building. The chairman has conducted these hearings in an impartial and fearless manner, intent on bringing out all facts, so that a picture of the entire problem might be obtained.

It is needless for me to remind the membership of this House that a serious problem does confront this country in reference to the preservation of wildlife. On the Pacific coast—and this matter was referred to a few moments ago—we have what we call the sardine problem. For a number of years plants along the shores of California, Oregon, and Washington have fished for and canned sardines. As long as they fish and can those sardines within the 3-mile limit, they are under the jurisdiction of the respective States. In California they are under the jurisdiction of the California State Game Commission. This commission can make rules and regulations governing the activities and the catch of those various plants, but in recent years a very serious problem has developed by reason of the fact that floating reduction plants have been operating outside of the 3-mile limit, under the jurisdiction of nobody.

They go out there into one of those schools of sardines and actually scoop up tons and tons of sardines. They do not use them for food. They use them principally for fertilizer. They are running unrestrained. I do not know whether the point of depletion is being reached, but I do believe that some agency should be authorized to make studies in reference to that so that we may have the facts and then provide whatever legislation is necessary.

The gentleman from Oklahoma complains about the duck situation in his State. We hope as a result of the work of this committee that a more thorough understanding of not only the duck problem but of all problems in relation to wildlife will be brought to the attention of this House and that these problems will, therefore, be more logically solved. I favor the resolution, and I commend it to the membership of the House. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on two subjects, and to insert in my remarks two bills which I have introduced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WILDLIFE CONSERVATION

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House, when this country of ours was first visited and thereafter settled by white men, our antecedents and ancestors, its wildlife resources beggared description by their very abundance. Nature's storehouse was bountifully supplied and nature's school lavishly equipped. For the first hundred years after we embarked as a society, or nation, under constitutional government of law, no legislative or administrative attention was paid to the wildlife resources of our country.

About a half century ago Congress authorized the establishment of a small agency within the Department of Agriculture to take up the study of American birds. Much of the work which is of vital importance to the Nation's wildlife resources has occurred since that time. Since then public interest has increased as these wildlife resources have become decimated and have decreased. Through the awakening of this public interest, knowledge through study of the problem involved has been of great additional value, and it has become more and more apparent that wildlife is a powerful factor affecting the economical, inspirational, and educational condition of all of the people. Federal activities directed toward its preservation, first very slowly and then with increasing speed, have been gradually extended to the point where the conservation of this natural resource has become one of the concerns of our Federal Government.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that until a comparatively recent date our country's billion-dollar resource was a neglected asset. There was no national program for its development, and at the beginning funds providing for the essential restoration work were small and highly uncertain. Essentially, most conservation legislation had to find its way to enactment and too often without the close and special consideration which these problems require. It finally became apparent that the Federal Government must take steps to adopt definite and constructive policies with respect to this important resource, so on April 7, 1930, the Special Committee on Wildlife Resources was appointed in the Senate. My colleagues will recall that this was followed in due course by the appointment of a similar committee in the House. At this juncture permit me to say that these committees have been, in the main, responsible for the great progress in the regeneration of wildlife in this country and the rehabilitation of the natural wildlife resources during the past 4 or 5 years.

Digressing for a moment, I pause to pay tribute to a scanty few of the great men of your and my country by using their example in a way which I hope may directly be of benefit. George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Sam Houston—whom we claim in Texas and WILLIS ROBERTSON claims in Virginia—were all granted the unusual privilege of attending the greatest of schools—the school of nature—throughout their lives. Our history is replete with evidence of the value of this rock-solid foundation for the useful expressions of their latterly acquired educational attainments in the service of our country. So I think it is to be conceded that whatever we may do to restore this great school to a condition where our future citizens may attend—the least, reasonably well equipped—is certainly no minor part of our fulfillment in the performance of our duty to posterity. The Migratory Bird Conservation Act, a measure to provide marsh and water areas to be set aside as sanctuaries for migratory birds, was enacted in 1929.

This important piece of conservation legislation, due principally to the fact that neither House had a committee to take action on this measure, had been ignored for many years. The Federal Migratory Bird Hunting Stamp Act presented by me in this Chamber became law in 1934, and I desire here to express appreciation for the cooperation and active interest displayed by the House Committee on Wildlife. Although this measure had the unanimous support of all the great conservation organizations, and its importance as a part of any national plan for the preservation of wildlife was recognized by these organizations, as well as major agriculture organizations, it had been shuffled from one House to the other for nearly 10 years without receiving the approval which made it effective.

For your added information, the sales of migratory bird hunting stamps yielded in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, $635,344; the following year, ended June 30, 1936, $446,919. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, a total of 487,987 stamps were sold by the Post Office Department from July 1 to December 31, 1936; however, reports are not in from all postmasters, so I think it will be fair to estimate that a total of $500,000 will be realized for this last year. From these figures, hunters of migratory birds have contributed $1,582,263 as their part in the national program.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Just what is that money used for? Is it used to buy game refuges?

Mr. KLEBERG. It is used for buying game refuges and for the purpose of property maintenance and caring for them, and also to meet the expense of looking into and appraising areas for the purpose of game refuges. It is used also in the development of these refuges; that is, in the construction of dams and dikes, ditches for feeding purposes, and any number of waterfowl protective measures.

Mr. SNELL. Does the Biological Survey have charge of all this fund and its expenditure?

Mr. KLEBERG. Not in its entirety, as I understand. I am not entirely informed, but I think I am correct in saying that the Bureau expends all of this fund with the exception of that portion allotted to the Post Office Department for the printing and sale of the "duck stamps", and so forth, which, I believe, amounts to approximately $25,000 annually.

Another bill of importance that was passed at that time, and a bill which today is of more importance than it was then, was the coordination bill introduced in the Senate by Senator ROBINSON, which called upon the various Federal agencies to coordinate their activities in any degree affecting natural wildlife resources. The Bureau of Fisheries was to be consulted with reference to drainage projects which might tend to pollute streams or to render streams less effective for the wildlife resources incident thereto.

Another matter has come up which should be considered by the Federal group which have to do with the coordination bill. The great oil industry of this Nation has undertaken to lease waters in navigable streams along the coastal lines in a manner without regard to Federal agencies and without regard to the possible pollution and destruction of wildlife incident to those operations. So I repeat that your committee should carefully look into the fact that the Congress of the United States adopted by unanimous vote the bill whereby the question of pollution and the destruction caused by ill-advised drainage and poorly worked out flood-control propositions should be studied so that that law will be made effective both as to the purposes for which it was intended and see that they do not destroy the natural resources at the same time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman, I believe, mentioned something about the Bureau of Fisheries. Is it not true there is a serious shortage of fish all over the country?

Mr. KLEBERG. I am not prepared at this time to go into statistics with reference to that shortage, but I am informed that in some lines of commercial fish there are serious shortages.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am informed by the people of Oklahoma that there is not anything like enough fish available to stock the ponds and streams.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman has reference to inland fish?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman is correct about that. Entirely so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am wondering if this committee has looked into the possibility of additional fish hatcheries to supply fish to those inland points?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. The subject of fish hatcheries is one, in its legislative branches, that comes under the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. That committee contemplates going into a revision of the 5-year program which was adopted several years ago, but was never completed.

Mr. KLEBERG. There are many ways in which your committee has been able and has assisted to preserve this great national heritage for the benefit of future generations of Americans. We now have a definite and constructive policy for the administration of our wildlife resources quite similar in purpose to the plan for the preservation of the national forests put into effect 30 years ago. Research and demonstration units have been established in nine land-grant colleges under Federal supervision. Our country at this moment is engaged in a $15,000,000 program for the restoration of wildlife through the acquisition and improvement of marsh and water areas. Approximately 2,000,000 acres have already been acquired in the program of acquisition. The definite value of this program finds two of its main values in its contribution as a soil-conservation and flood-control measure.

Mr. Speaker, the American people have come to regard the efforts of your committee with great interest and high approval. A general and favorable opinion expressed on all sides indicates that the future welfare of our valuable and irreplaceable wild birds, animals, and fish depends in a very large degree upon the continued effort of this special committee in the Congress. It is patent that as the program outlined progresses Congress, in the exercise of its authorized powers, greatly needs the agency it now has in this committee to report from time to time and take remedial action on steps that inevitably occur in the natural process of giving back this great resource in which our public is so interested. It would be most unfortunate if anything should occur which should militate against the continued unity and effectiveness of this committee's contribution to the harmonious and effective work already performed by the Congress. It would be equally disastrous and unfortunate were we by unfavorable action to this resolution to begin to dispel the confidence which supports the national program at this time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose if anybody made the statement on this floor today that, to a considerable degree, at least, the destructive force of the floodwaters in the Ohio Valley is due to the selfish, visionless disregard of restoration and conservation, it would sound like an incredible statement; yet, in my judgment, that statement could be very safely made today and remain within the boundaries of truth.

To remain within the scope and purpose of the pending resolution, I want to address a few remarks to this subject of restoration of wildlife. I want to go a way back in a generic way to the destruction of the balance of Nature in this country. I think most of our difficulties, most of our ills result from the fact that we fail to operate in conformity with the laws of Nature. Nowhere is that more true than in the field of conservation and restoration.

For instance, I think of a river that traverses the State of Illinois that is 273 miles long, and we will just take that by way of illustration. It starts up near Chicago and flows diagonally across the State down in the direction of St. Louis. That river has been there a long time. When Nature had finished fashioning that river valley it was in some places a mile wide and in some places 7 miles wide. For the most part, that river valley was adequate as a basin and reservoir for all floodwaters that might come down. Then, prompted by selfishness and lack of vision, we had people look longingly at those fertile acres along the Illinois River, and in a little while they began to take away from Nature and from the river that which was rightfully hers, and then they express astonishment and surprise when suddenly Nature strikes out and takes back that which rightfully belongs to her.

My remarks today are prompted by the fact that I was for 5 years a drainage contractor on the Illinois River. I think I know a little something about moving dirt, about marine construction, about the building of levees, and about ditching, and about getting the run-off of rainfall expedited, so that it gets into the major watercourses of the country. What you see in the Ohio Valley today with all the attendant anguish, suffering, and destruction, which in my judgment will cost a billion dollars to replace, is nothing but mute tribute to the fact that we failed to operate in conformity with Nature.

The first thing that visionless folks did was to stick a plow in the ground in that western country and destroy the native long and short grasses that fixed the moisture in the soil without a single thought of the future. They came along with the ax of the woodsman and struck down millions of those magnificent specimens of trees that are the Almighty's instruments for somehow fixing climate. If you want to know what a tree really means to Nature, let me tell you what one learns from a study of the physical sciences. An ordinary oak, in its full magnificence, will have as many as 150,000 leaves. The roots of that oak extend down into the soil and take up the moistures in which is dissolved the mineral content of the soil. It goes through the trunk and branches and it goes into the leaves, and then by what the botanists call "transpiration" it comes out into the atmosphere in the form of vapor. There comes these caressing breezes that touch the vapor, precipitate it, send it back down to earth in the form of rainfall. These forests that we had in the country, hundreds of millions of acres of them, fixed the climate and they preserved balance in Nature and helped anchor the soil moisture. But we went in with the ax and ruthlessly destroyed them.

Do you know what you do when you destroy a single beautiful tree? You destroy an instrumentality that will transpire, or exude, as much as 10,000 gallons of water in a single summer day. That sounds incredible, yet these trees which pick up the moisture in the soil send it out through those little veins and pores in the leaves into the atmosphere. Then the winds come along and send it back down and give you the perfect balance. We destroyed those trees, and cut-over lands in the Northwest and in the Ohio Valley are tribute to our destruction. We have been ruthlessly destroying the balance in this country by destroying our natural resources, by destroying the natural balance wheels which Nature provided.

Then we go into this matter of drainage, and I want to relate it to the substance of this pending resolution. I have helped to build levees along the Illinois River. I can remember the time when a little sweetpotato ridge was enough to keep water off the lowlands. Then they had to be built higher. We would come in with huge dipper dredges with 90-foot booms, a boat which was 60 feet in beam and 110 feet long, carrying a 3-yard dipper, and would dig down into a barrow pit, throw the dirt over until we got way up to the 460-foot elevation on the basis of the Memphis datum level, all for the purpose of keeping flood waters from going over into these natural reservoirs which nature had so generously provided. Then came the plow. Then came yields of 100 bushels of corn to the acre in all these beautiful lowlands—320,000 acres of rich land in that Illinois Valley alone that has been taken away from Nature. And then what happened? When you get a ridge on this side of the river and a ridge on the other side of the river to crib and confine the water and nature begins to swish her tail and sends the spring freshets and the waters of the melted snows down the river valleys, what happens? The water goes over the top of the man-made ridges called levees. Nature seeks to reclaim what is hers and then everyone marvels; but there is no marvel about it. The water goes up and pours over the top, or cuts crevasses in the levee and then people rush to save their lives, to move their grain, flee from their houses and dwellings. But Nature is unmindful of all that, she comes and takes that which was hers.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CONNOR of New York. After having heard of the extension of remarks the gentleman intends to place in the RECORD, I am surprised he should rise at this time to talk about water.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I just thought the gentleman from New York would indulge in a witticism today. I will say to my friend from New York, however, that unfortunately we still do not manufacture quite enough of that to which he refers to fill that river valley.

But then comes Nature and takes back that which is hers and there ensues millions and millions of dollars in damage, and we marvel. There is no marvel about it.

One of these days I want to introduce a bill in proper form to handle this situation.

As related to the pending resolution, what does it mean? Every time we put 10,000 acres behind a great earthen wall we have taken it away from the ducks; we have taken it away from the birds; we have taken it away from the wildfowl; we have taken it away from the fish. Then we expect the fish to spawn in water that has been polluted by the sewage of a great metropolis like Chicago, and of other cities and towns on the Illinois River; and there is no place, no quiet water, no refuge water, in which the fish can spawn. Little by little the fishing is destroyed, hunting for most folks is destroyed, and all places for people to exercise the instincts of outdoor pursuit are taken away.

Then we attempt to meet the demand for outdoor recreation with synthetic indoor recreation and chortle, "Ain't Nature grand!"

What is the remedy for this sort of thing? Give back to Nature that which was hers; give back to the fish that which rightfully belongs to the fish; and to the ducks what belongs to the ducks. Let us restore, if we can, some of these rich resources that were once here.

Illinois was admitted to the Union only 119 years ago. Had we been privileged to traverse her fields and watercourses at that time, we would have found an abundance of long and short grasses to help anchor the soil moisture. We would have found enough timber and forest to stop the precipitate run-off of the rainfall and help preserve a beautiful balance. We would have found creeks and streams and rivers with long watersheds but ample reservoir space to take care of unusual volumes of water. We would have found those streams teeming with fish life. In fact, only 40 years ago the Illinois River ranked next to the Columbia as a fish-producing stream. We would have found lowlands that were the habitat of ducks and fish, where anyone could go and catch a mess of fish or shoot a brace of ducks. We would have found Nature in all her glory, where man could go and commune with her and wash out the imperfections of spirit. We would have found a domain where one could really get close to the infinite.

Today we have remade Nature and given her a new face. Streams are polluted, fish life has been destroyed, ducks have to be artificially fed, levees have been built at huge expense to confine the waters, and people have been deprived of what I like to think of as an inalienable right to the enjoyment of forest and stream.

I might tell you what happens so far as the wild fowl is concerned. You reclaim all these drainage districts and in a little while you will see that all the duck weed has disappeared: all of the wild fowl food, all the wild rice has disappeared, and then somebody comes along and sets out a feeding ground, feeding $10,000 or $15,000 worth of corn in a single season, in the hope of anchoring the ducks in that area so that they may get a little shooting.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. May I say that the area drained in the two Dakotas alone is more than the entire Great Lakes and that includes the marshes and sloughs in those two States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The paradoxical thing about all this is while we are witnessing this great catastrophe in the Ohio River Valley, last summer they had in Washington what was known as an upstream engineering conference to deal with water conservation. The gentleman from Virginia will remember that. For what purpose? For the purpose of devising ways and means of saving the soil water in the country. When they got down to facts, what did they find? They found, for instance, in States like Montana, North and South Dakota, and others, the water table in the soil has receded as much as 16 feet in the last 10 years. That is why wells go dry every summer. That is why we now have the spectacle of a drought on the one side in summer and a flood on the other in spring or winter. Really, it is a pathetic spectacle.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment all artificial and synthetic proposals are not going to solve this great problem until we get right with Nature and get right with the world and give back to Nature that which belongs to her.

There is ample inspiration for a real program. This is probably a better time to do it than any other. We are going to spend $480,000,000 every year for soil conservation. We had an Agricultural Adjustment Act which took out of cultivation some 40,000,000 acres of land. Why not take this money in the aggregate and buy the land along our water courses? Then we will solve the bulk of the problem once and for all. Why not do that instead of trying to move these levees back and still retain from Nature that which belongs to Nature? Four hundred and eighty million dollars a year would go a long way toward buying this land. If we produce too much farm produce of all kinds and pay for reducing and destroying it, why not buy the acreage which produces it, take it out of cultivation, give it back to ducks, to fish, and to timber and solve several problems with one stroke?

They came out there last summer and wanted to buy some of this fine alluvial land in the Illinois Valley for $10 an acre. You are not going to buy it for that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] can tell you that land on the basis of general land value is worth $100 or $150 an acre. If we expect to get it, we will have to pay for it, but in the long run it is going to be the cheapest policy to pursue for unfortunately we are going to have this flood problem to contend with year in and year out, because we have done our best to hasten the run-off, deplete the soil of the water table, and get all the water into the water courses as soon as possible. Then the freshets came that spread everywhere and destroy property on every hand, bringing in their wake destruction, anxiety, bitterness, and despair.

Mr. Speaker, that is the program we will have to follow. So I am very much encouraged by the recommendations and suggestions of the gentleman from Virginia, and I hope as this committee goes along on the basis of its extended life the members can give more and more attention to this matter and make some specific recommendation. It seems to me that is the only solution for a problem where we have for almost a hundred years been destroying the natural resources of the United States of America.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Is it not a fact that practically one-half of these drainage districts along the Illinois River are not self-sustaining from a financial angle when their current problems are considered, plus the bonded indebtedness and interest?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. We have been going before the R. F. C. trying to get some of them refinanced at 25 cents on the dollar so that they may keep going. There you have an example of misguided selfishness and how it did not work out. Sooner or later we are going to have to get around to this problem of establishing a program that is in conformity with nature.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. May I correct just one statement the gentleman made, and that is with reference to the water level. I believe he stated 16 feet. In the Dakotas it was 50 feet.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Maybe it was a good deal more. I was trying to strike an average from the figures that came to my desk last summer.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That was in the Dakotas.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There has been a recession in the water table. This will not be the last of the floods unless we do something to restore the reservoir space to the streams as originally intended, and carry on a program to hold the soil moisture.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. There is another and important matter which the gentleman touched on and that is reforestation of all the marginal and submarginal lands, as well as the hill and mountain lands that border upon the tributaries of the Ohio Valley. This will take a long period of time, but will really assist in solving this problem.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think so.

Mr. PARSONS. It will take 20 or 25 years to become effective; but had the territory in the Ohio Valley been reforested it would have kept 45 percent of the run-off water in the soil.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I note in the current accounts of the floods in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys that levees had to be opened or cut or dynamited in various places to afford reservoir space in the hope of saving the property in nearby towns. What more eloquent testimony is required to affirm the need for a program that is right with Nature and which must restore to her that of which she was despoiled by the selfishness of man?

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, the very distinguished gentleman from the district which is adjacent to mine and who has just finished a most interesting talk upon the question before the House, places me in the position of saying to you that the gentleman has practically made the speech that I had contemplated making when I asked for the time upon this matter.

I represent the Twentieth Congressional District of Illinois, comprising 10 counties, 9 of which touch the Illinois and the Mississippi Rivers. The tenth county is adjacent to the Sangamon River, which empties into the Illinois River.

There is probably no greater duck country in the central west than that which exists in my district. As the distinguished gentleman [Mr. DIRKSEN] just said, in the early history of the Illinois Valley wildlife was abundant in every form, and then came, first, the turning of the Des Plaines River upside down and running it into the Illinois instead of Lake Michigan, allowing the sewage disposal from the city of Chicago and other cities along the stream to enter. This was the primary factor in the destruction of all the fish life in what was one of the greatest productive rivers from the standpoint of fishing in all America.

I can recall when I was a boy on the Illinois River that the fish produced from a commercial standpoint was more than any other river in the United States, save and except the Columbia in the great Northwest. We still have fish, but the major portion of the industry has been destroyed because of the pollution and because of the drainage districts which have been established along the Illinois River.

I approach another point in this discussion, from the standpoint of economics, when I tell the Members of this House that during the last 25 years thousands upon thousands of acres of delinquent and swamp land, which at one time produced nothing in the way of revenues, have today been purchased by the sportsmen throughout the Central West, and 2 years ago, while chairman of the tax commission of the State commission of Illinois, I caused my investigators to make a survey of the number of acres that had been taken over from the delinquent-tax rolls of the counties upon the Illinois and the Mississippi, as well as ascertaining as nearly as possible the value of this land, and also the number of individuals who were dependent upon the hunting for a livelihood in the fall of the year. It was found that 6,000 individuals and their families in the State of Illinois alone were dependent primarily for a livelihood upon hunting in the fall of the year, while thousands upon thousands of acres, with millions of dollars invested, was also discovered. These people have come there and purchased lands which were practically worthless some 30 years ago and, as I said before, delinquent so far as tax assessments were concerned. These lands have been placed upon a parity as far as assessment purposes are concerned with the agricultural farm lands nearby, the result being that several country school districts and community high-school districts are practically maintained and operated due to the revenue thus produced, and which comes from the land owned by the sportsmen of that community. If anything should happen to further restrict the hunting in this great valley, the time may come when these lands may return to the delinquent state, thereby cutting off all revenue and throwing many men out of employment, as well as crippling the educational advantages of the youth therein.

I am vitally interested in the Biological Survey of this Government of ours, and I sincerely hope that this committee, which is going to function for another 2 years, will keep closely in touch with that agency of government.

We have delegated, in my humble judgment, too much authority and power at the present time to this Service so far as rules and regulations are concerned, and unless a committee of this kind keeps in close touch with what is going on—and I know that with the able Members who are on this committee they will—they may take too much authority and power under the regulations they issue from time to time, many of which even their own men in the field can scarcely understand. Confusion reigned out in my section as to what this regulation might mean or what that regulation might mean. State wardens were telling you one thing, the Federal wardens were telling you another, and there seemed to be no program of cooperation or harmony with respect to what the regulations meant and how they should be adequately and properly enforced.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. As the gentleman knows, we have only been trying this out for the past 3 years, and over a period of a few years we will be able to get a striking average that will give each State and each section of a State the proper days for an open season, so that we may let the sportsmen have their day in court and at the same time protect the fowls and give them a chance to increase.

Mr. LUCAS. No one wants to protect the fowls more than myself, but under the regulations as they existed last year—I say with all sincerity and based upon personal knowledge—the wild duck was not protected. Two years ago, under the regulations with respect to feeding, you were prohibited from shooting a duck within 200 yards from where you were feeding. To me this was an excellent regulation. Last year this was removed entirely, and what happened? Every man who could get a gun and a boat went to this river or to the stream nearby and, instead of being able to kill a duck and retrieve it, he shot at the duck at any distance in the air, and, if fortunate enough to hit the flying mark, the duck landed somewhere in no man's land and was never recovered. The ordinary hunter out in a boat on the Illinois River or in the lakes nearby would bring down 30 ducks before he would be able to get the limit of 10; and unless you have two men, two boats, and two good dogs out there waiting for them to fall, you never retrieved the cripples that went a quarter of a mile away.

High shooting is always responsible for cripples going a quarter of a mile and sometimes three-quarters of a mile before they fall. This is important, and the director of conservation of Illinois had his men down through the Illinois Valley checking up on the cripples that they could find, and hundreds upon hundreds of crippled ducks were found and brought to the department where they were being nurtured back to life. Obviously thousands upon thousands died, all of which was conservation in reverse. I maintain that the regulation in force last year was a detriment to the protection of the ducks rather than protecting them as was intended. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 4 more minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. I hope this committee, in the study of this conservation problem, will seriously take into consideration my particular section of the State.

Ladies and gentlemen of the House, in line with my distinguished colleague from Illinois I want to say there was a time in the Illinois Valley when we had all of the natural feed necessary to sustain and feed the wildlife therein, but through pollution and drainage it was shamelessly destroyed. Wild rice, wild celery, the potato vine, the duck weed, the marsh weed, the Yorkonut, the smartweed grew in abundance; we also had the acorns from the pin oaks over on the ridge for the mallards. All of that is gone. We are in the natural flight of the ducks from north to south and they must stop in the Illinois Valley. Ladies and gentlemen, they should have some feed in that particular section, even if it be artificial. The duck is not responsible for human hands destroying and disturbing his onetime feeding paradise.

In my humble judgment, the regulation that we had 2 years ago was a proper regulation, and I am going to make a fight with the Biological Survey to bring that regulation back for the benefit of the wild duck and the sportsmen, not only of Illinois but of other parts of the country.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is discussing a very interesting matter, especially to the people of Michigan. We had a fight a few years ago about taking water out of Lake Michigan for the purpose of washing Chicago's sewage down the river, and this sewage has now destroyed the wildlife in the gentleman's district. Now, the gentleman should help us to undo what was unwittingly done and let us get our lake levels back and you get your wildlife back.

Mr. LUCAS. The gentleman from Michigan has made an interesting observation, but it is not material to this debate. Some day I shall be glad to discuss that matter with him.

In conclusion, it would seem to me, as the gentleman from Illinois said, that the day is here when something constructive should be done for the fishing industry of the country, the hunting industry of the country, and also to do something for the flood situation as it develops each year with greater and more serious problems than the flood before. No one would have ever thought that the flood in Portsmouth, Ohio, would go higher than the previous record. I say now is the time when the Government could well afford to make a comprehensive study of all these problems to the end that legislation might be enacted whereby the Government might take over all of the lands in the drainage districts of the important river valleys. Under such a program we would return to Mother Nature as we found her in the pioneer days, and by so doing we would bring back the fishing industry, the wildlife in the valleys, and make a long stride in the controlling of future floods. I may soon offer a bill in this Congress for the purpose of at least making a preliminary survey to ascertain facts and data upon which an intelligent consideration may be made of the most far-reaching problem in American life today. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO FILE REPORT

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may have until midnight Monday next to file a report, including minority views, on House Joint Resolution 96.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object—and I do so to make an inquiry—can the gentleman tell us when he is going to call that resolution up in the House?

Mr. COOPER. I am sorry that I am not prepared to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman expect it to come up next week?

Mr. COOPER. Probably the latter part of the week. The majority leader can probably give the gentleman more information than I.

Mr. RAYBURN. If it is possible to reach it, we hope to call it up the latter part of next week. I cannot say now for the reason that we do not know how long we will be in consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix by inserting therein an article written by my colleague from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] on wildlife resources.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, a year ago the Governor of Pennsylvania appointed a special committee to report on public assistance and relief. I am in receipt of a letter from the chairman of that special committee, and included in that letter is a copy of a resolution adopted by the Committee on Public Assistance and Relief. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks by inserting that letter in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, within the glory of whose living presence we are assembled at this morning hour: Refresh us with Thy spirit and endue us with strength sufficient for our needs, courage, and insight that we may meet and overcome all our difficulties.

Help us to live this day in serene sincerity of purpose, cultivating cheerfulness and magnanimity, exercising carefulness in conversation, courteous consideration for each other, diligence in our appointed service, and fidelity to our trust.

Thus by our example may we become messengers of Thine, sent by the clear compulsions of Thy love to homeless hearts, to loveless lives, and to those who have no guide. We ask it in the name of Him who had not where to lay His head yet who loves us to the uttermost and is ever the Good Shepherd of our souls, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

House Concurrent Resolution 1

Concurrent resolution urging a "peace for America" program by taking the profit out of war and war preparations, by government control of munitions, by strict neutrality, no foreign entanglements, and by a more effective national defense

Whereas because of the imminent danger of European powers to again be drawn into a conflict which would endanger world civilization itself:

SECTION 1. We favor wartime draft legislation that will force industry, finance, commerce, and the manpower of this Nation to assume an equal responsibility for the Nation's safety. All phases of our national life must be called upon to share equally the burdens of war, with sacrifices for all and profits for none. We believe the elimination of profits in this manner will discourage the efforts of those individuals who would advocate America's participation in war.

SEC. 2. We believe the manufacture and sale of munitions is an important phase of our national defense and should be under the control of the Federal Government at all times. We believe the sale of munitions by American manufacturers to foreign countries is a contributing factor to the causes that lead to war. We protest against the sale of munitions that may later be used to destroy the lives of America's soldiers, sailors, and marines.

SEC. 3. We do not believe that wars can forever be eliminated, but we do believe that America's geographical position of comparative isolation makes it unnecessary for the United States to participate in future wars unless attacked by an aggressive nation. We demand strict neutrality for America, with policies that will remove the causes of possible entanglements with belligerents in other wars.

SEC. 4. We are opposed to the theory that America's military forces must be used to protect the investments and property of private individuals and private industry beyond the boundaries of the United States.

SEC. 5. We are opposed to treaties, alliances of agreements with other foreign powers that may in any way endanger our neutrality in time of war.

SEC. 6. We contend that we must have a national defense on land, on the high seas, and in the air adequate at all times to preserve our neutrality and command the respect of other nations for American principles.

SEC. 7. That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of the United States Senators and Members of Congress from the State of South Dakota.

RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICAN SUGAR CANE LEAGUE—LOUISIANA SUGAR QUOTA

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I present for appropriate disposition resolutions adopted by the American Sugar Cane League at New Orleans, La., on January 27, 1937, which I ask may be treated as in the nature of a petition. I also ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the American Sugar Cane League at New Orleans, La., on Wednesday, January 27, 1937

Whereas the American Sugar Cane League, on behalf of its 7,771 members and all sugarcane producers in Louisiana, has consistently demanded the elimination of any quota restrictive of the continental production of sugar, and upon all occasions has declared that an equitable settlement of the Louisiana quota problem is a necessary condition precedent to any commitment on proposed legislation or any part thereof: Be it

Resolved, That the American Sugar Cane League reiterates its declared position of unwillingness to support any proposal which fails to provide an adequate quota for Louisiana, for the simple reason that there can be no equitable solution of the problems of the sugarcane growers of Louisiana unless the present restrictive quota figures are removed entirely or replaced with a quota for Louisiana based on the normal production records of the past and the production and prospects of the present, or there be provided by law a continental quota equally advantageous to the growers of all sugar-producing States; be it further

Resolved, That the American Sugar Cane League expresses its appreciation of the continuing efforts of the Senators and Representatives in Congress for the betterment of the Louisiana sugarcane industry, which is so important to the general welfare of the State of Louisiana, and expresses its confidence in the success of their pleading of our cause before Congress and the officials of the national administration.

CAPITAL AUDITORIUM COMMISSION

The bill (S. 974) to create the Capital Auditorium Commission was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, earlier in the day I notified the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that I would request that this proposal go over until Monday. I then thought it was a legislative bill, but, after examining it, I find it merely provides for the appointment of a commission, so I have no objection to the passage of the measure at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the word "plans", to strike out "the auditorium when constructed to be under the control and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior" and to insert "and to recommend how that cost shall be borne and how the auditorium, when constructed, shall be controlled and supervised", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created a Commission to consist of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Interior, said Commission to be known as the Capital Auditorium Commission. Said Commission shall be authorized to investigate as to desirable sites for an auditorium to be constructed in the city of Washington with sufficient capacity, in the opinion of the Commission, to meet the requirements of public convenience and necessity.

The Commission is authorized to ascertain the approximate cost of a suitable site and of the erection of an auditorium thereon and to formulate plans, and to recommend how that cost shall be borne and how the auditorium, when constructed, shall be controlled and supervised. The Commission shall report to the Congress its plans and recommendations for legislation to carry out the same at any time during the present session of the Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I find on the list of North Dakota postmasters whose names are sent to the Senate for confirmation the names of two upon which I have been withholding approval. I do not mean to say that I wish finally to disapprove them, but I should like action upon them temporarily postponed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator allow an exception to be made of those two, and let them go over until he can look into them?

Mr. NYE. Yes; the last two names on the list under the heading "North Dakota."

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator refers to the nomination of Joseph E. DeMers to be postmaster at St. John, N. Dak., and the nomination of Hulda E. Hezel to be postmaster at Zeeland, N. Dak.?

Mr. NYE. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the exception of those two, I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters will be confirmed en bloc with the exceptions suggested by the Senator from North Dakota and agreed to by the Senator from Tennessee.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1937

The Reverend Anson Phelps Stokes, of the Washington Cathedral, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we come before Thee this day with grateful hearts for the blessings of a free government. We beseech Thee that the deliberations of this body may be such as to insure their continuance and development until the kingdoms of this world are transferred into the kingdom of God—the rule of peace, justice, intelligence, freedom, and good will throughout the world. Especially do we pray at this time for all poor, homeless, and unemployed folk who, as a result of flood or industrial strife, are suffering hardship. Give them hope and courage, and strengthen all who are striving to solve their problems. Grant to Thy servants here assembled the wisdom to adopt such legislation as may reduce all national hazards in the future. We offer our prayers for the President and his advisers, the Members of the Congress, the Supreme Court, and all others in authority, that they may seek, find, and carry out Thy will in all the relations of life. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas there are located in the southeastern portion of the State of Missouri vast areas of rich and fertile agricultural lands; and

Whereas such territory has included therein numerous towns and cities and is heavily populated; is traversed by improved Federal and State highways, railroads, electric, telephone, and telegraph wires; and there is located in said territory many postal routes, together with numerous schools, churches, community buildings and other improvements appurtenant to one of the most-productive and best-developed sections of the State of Missouri; and

Whereas such territory for the past 12 years or longer has been almost annually inundated by overflows of the St. Francis River and its inhabitants undergo great suffering, want, and deprivation, together with enormous losses of livestock, growing crops, damage to homes, buildings, etc.; and

Whereas the St. Francis River is again at flood stage and the large population in the territory affected are suffering from the worst flood in history and has suffered much loss of property; and, in addition thereto, there now exists in said territory much human suffering and misery, and the economic life and existence of this territory is now seriously jeopardized and threatened; and

Whereas at the Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, there was enacted by the Congress of the United States an amendment to the Mississippi River Flood Control Act of 1928, such amendment being generally known and designated as the Overton bill, approved June 15, 1936, and which said bill authorized, pursuant to the provisions thereof, the construction of adequate levees and/or reservoirs to protect the territory in southeast Missouri and northeast Arkansas from the annual overflows of the St. Francis River and its tributaries; and

Whereas said Overton bill authorized an appropriation by the Congress of the United States in the sum of $16,000,000 to carry into effect the heretofore adopted plan of flood control for the St. Francis River and its tributaries in Missouri and Arkansas north of the backwater area: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized to immediately appropriate the $16,000,000 authorized by the Overton bill to control the floods of the St. Francis River and its tributaries in Missouri and Arkansas north of the backwater area, in order that the improved, developed, and thickly populated area affected may be protected and acute human suffering relieved and large annually recurring property loss and damage eliminated, and in order that a great asset of our State and Nation may be preserved and protected and millions of dollars heretofore spent in highly developing the affected area be protected and preserved; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the United States Senate, and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States at Washington, D. C.

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress in appreciation of the great value to the State of Oklahoma derived from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, identified as the P. W. A., and memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress to continue such loans and grants for works of a lasting nature as has been afforded this State since the inception of this Administration in 1933

Whereas the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has materially assisted the State of Oklahoma in providing valuable improvements to the State institutions and has afforded employment, both directly and indirectly, to a vast number of Oklahoma citizens at livable wages on valuable public works of a lasting nature; and

Whereas the people of the State of Oklahoma realize the many great benefits of this extensive and most valuable program to our State school system, to the several State institutions which have benefited directly through the P. W. A., and the benefits to the various counties and municipalities of this State brought through the able administration of the Honorable Harold L. Ickes and his local administrators: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of this Sixteenth Legislature, session of 1937, of the State of Oklahoma (the senate concurring therein), That the President of the United States and the Congress are hereby memorialized by the people of Oklahoma, through their representatives in the legislature, in appreciation of the past and present benefits of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, and that the President of the United States and the Congress be respectfully requested to grant a continuance of this valuable and worthy cause in the State of Oklahoma; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to the President of the United States, and that copies be mailed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to the Senate of the United States, and to the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior and Administrator of Public Works, and to the Oklahoma Public Works Administration, and to each of the two Senators and to each Member of the House of Representatives from Oklahoma.

Adopted by the house of representatives the 7th day of January 1937.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a senate concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, adopted in appreciation of the past and present benefits of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, and favoring the continuance of Public Works projects in the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(The text of this resolution is identical with the house concurrent resolution appearing on p. 608.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Whereas the Federal Banking Act of 1935, effective as law August 23, 1935, provides that on and after 2 years from that date, namely, August 23, 1937, no bank a member of the Federal Reserve System or a bank member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation "shall directly or indirectly by any devise whatsoever pay any interest on any deposit which is payable on demand", which prohibition shall likewise apply "to any deposit of public funds made by or on behalf of any State, county, school district, or other subdivision or municipality" if they are public funds that are payable on demand; and

Whereas all such public funds in Iowa are payable on demand or, in other words, are withdrawable by any such political subdivision from its bank depositories at any time without notice, and that Iowa's public funds law provides that such public funds "shall" be deposited in banks and "shall draw interest at the rate of not less than 2 percent per annum on 90 percent of the collected daily balances, payable by the bank at the end of each month", with the provision that the rate may be lowered by the State treasurer, with the approval of the executive council, but not below 1 percent on 90 percent of the collected daily balances payable by the bank at the end of each month, and that the interest payable by bank depositories goes directly into the Iowa State sinking fund to be used in paying those claims that are filed against that fund by municipalities for their public funds that were in banks which went into receivership; and

Whereas the Iowa State sinking fund today is approximately $9,000,000 in arrears and that it is estimated it will take from 4 to 5 years or more to pay off that deficit if Iowa's public funds can continue to earn the usual interest from its bank depositories during that period, which approximates even at the low 1-percent interest rate prevailing today about $850,000 per year, or twice that amount if and when the rate is doubled, which will occur when it is economically sound to do so; that the sum of money yet recoverable from assets of those former depository banks still in receivership will in the future, it is estimated, be of no substantial amount, owing to the fact that such receiverships are approaching their end and that it is unfair to continue to divert the beer tax to the State sinking fund when it is badly needed for other tax purposes; that the beer tax, amounting to approximately $1,500,000 annually, will be the only substantial sum left to pay off the deficit in Iowa's State sinking fund if depository banks in Iowa are prohibited from paying interest on public funds as before herein mentioned; and that it is only fair to Iowa's taxpayers that their funds should have the opportunity to earn a reasonable rate of interest pending the time when such funds shall be disbursed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Iowa (the house of representatives concurring therein), That we call upon the Congress of the United States to amend the Federal Banking Act of 1935 so that all banks members of the Federal Reserve System and banks members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation may continue to accept public deposits and pay interest on them, regardless of the fact that such deposits may be withdrawable on demand; and we respectfully request the Iowa congressional delegation, whose assistance is herewith respectfully requested, to ask Congress at this session to enact the needed amendment as foregoingly explained, and that everything be done that can be done within the power and influence of the Iowa congressional delegation to prevail upon Congress to strike from the Federal Banking Act of 1935 that prohibition against the payment of interest on public funds payable on demand or to at least postpone its effective date for not less than 5 years further from August 23, 1937, to enable State sinking funds such as we have in Iowa to be fully paid off; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Whereas Government and private enterprises seek to alleviate present-day employment rather than create lower standards; and

Whereas the star-route carriers cannot participate in recovery under the present contract system; and

Whereas similar forms of mail transportation are paid adequate salaries and have permanent jobs: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Unicameral Legislature of the State of Nebraska, That the Seventy-fifth Congress of the United States enact such legislation as is necessary to make more permanent all star-route contracts and to regulate a reasonable rate of pay thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis, Mo., favoring the making of an additional appropriation to continue the investigation by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor of violations of the right of free speech and assembly and interference with the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Oklahoma State Board of Agriculture, commending a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma in appreciation of the past and present benefits of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, and favoring the continuance of Federal loans and grants in aid of works projects in the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the committee on resolutions of the Montana State convention on the Townsend National Recovery Plan, favoring the enactment of legislation embodying the so-called Townsend old-age pension plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Steam Shovel and Dredgemen's Local Union, No. 45, of San Francisco, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a naval supply base at Oakland, Calif., which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COPELAND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New York City (N. Y.) and vicinity, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation prohibiting the shipment of arms and munitions to Spain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ANTILYNCHING SENTIMENT

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary an editorial from the Washington Post under date of February 1, entitled "Antilynching Sentiment."

There being no objection, the editorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANTILYNCHING SENTIMENT

If a bill to make lynching a Federal crime comes up again for debate in Congress, the traditional argument that the South will not consider restraints on this lawless practice will be found to have lost its force. For a poll conducted by the American Institute of Public Opinion indicates that 65 percent of the South favors a Federal antilynching law.

This compares with an average of 70 percent for the country as a whole. Curiously, greatest opposition is expressed on the Pacific coast, but tempers abnormally inflamed by the recent Mattson kidnaping and murder may furnish a partial explanation of that attitude.

As for the South's reaction, it is only reasonable to conclude that extra-legal executions so distress the general population that the majority, despairing of successful control by State authorities, is now ready to call in Federal assistance. The region's time-honored solicitude for States' rights makes this shift in sentiment especially impressive. Moreover, it is plainly no sudden change of heart occasioned by any recent increase in lynchings. For, to the contrary, 1936 records show nine fewer lynchings throughout the country than in any of the last 4 years.

Perhaps this improvement will discourage any drive for antilynching legislation at this session of Congress. In any event, it should impel those who draft bills on this subject to restrict their scope. Most previous bills have been unpopular in the North as well as the South because of their bland disregard for the separation of State and Federal responsibilities and their consequent highly questionable constitutionality.

REPORTS OF THE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 418) for the relief of Robert H. Muirhead, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 25) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 461) to settle claims of farmers whose lands were damaged by waters from Kelly Field, Tex., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 26) thereon.

UTILIZATION OF WATER RESOURCES OF THE ARID AND IRRIGABLE STATES

Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 65) authorizing an investigation relative to utilization of water resources of arid and irrigable States (submitted by Mr. BANKHEAD Jan. 19, 1937), reported it with an amendment; and, under the rule, the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE OF DECEMBER 21, 1904—REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF CORPORATIONS

Mr. HAYDEN. From the Committee on Printing I report a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 74) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 500 additional copies of the message of the President of the United States dated December 21, 1904, transmitting the report of the Commissioner of Corporations (H. Doc. No. 165, 58th Cong., 3d sess.) covering the period from the organization of the Bureau to June 30, 1904, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution which has just been agreed to, authorizing the publication of 500 copies of the message transmitted by the President of the United States in 1904, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact that this document contains a very interesting discussion by James R. Garfield, who was at that time Commissioner of Corporations, upon the subject of Federal incorporation.

Mr. Garfield made his report to the then President, Theodore Roosevelt. As a part of this report there are several appendixes which discuss the legal questions involved in the whole subject of Federal licenses and charters for corporations engaged in commerce among the States, and Senators and Members of the House of Representatives who are now giving attention to that subject will find this document of utmost interest.

NEUTRALITY

Mr. CLARK. On behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and myself, I introduce a joint resolution dealing with the question of neutrality, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from Missouri.

By Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. BONE, Mr. VANDENBERG, and Mr. NYE):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 74, 74th Cong.) approved February 29, 1936; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MEMORIAL TO THOMAS JEFFERSON—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on January 22 I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 52, relating to a permanent memorial in the city of Washington, D. C., to the memory of Thomas Jefferson. The joint resolution calls for the construction of a building for the housing of various organizations, and also provides for a statue of Thomas Jefferson.

I was advised when the joint resolution was introduced that all measures relating to the erection of statues in the District of Columbia should be referred to the Committee on the Library. Accordingly that reference was made of the joint resolution.

A bill was also introduced by the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] dealing with a part of the same subject. His bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

It seems to me the provisions of the joint resolution which I have introduced are germane to the same subject, and accordingly I ask that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of my joint resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ALLEGATIONS PERTAINING TO SENATORIAL PERQUISITES

Mr. HOLT. I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 73), as follows:

Whereas the great institutional prestige of the proper powers of the Senate of the United States should not be obscured by scandalous rumors as to the abuses of senatorial perquisites by individual Senators thereof; and

Whereas certain allegations appeared in an article entitled "Lord Guffey of Pennsylvania", published in the magazine The American Mercury, in the issue for November 1936 and have attained a large circulation thereby; and

Whereas such article makes sensational charges about the political and personal past of a Member of the august Senate of the United States, and implies past lack of perquisites, and present abuses of perquisites of the duties of a Senator; and

Whereas such charges, if untrue, are not only scandalous and libelous, but conducive to an unhealthy disrespect for the Senate of the United States by the people of this country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary shall study the charges and allegations made in such article "Lord Guffey of Pennsylvania", impugning the motives and character of the Honorable JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, junior Senator from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and that said committee shall make a report to the Senate as to the truth or falsity of such charges.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not rise in the attitude of a censor. Such an attitude would never be permitted by this body. I do say, however, if the Senate of the United States is going to pause in its great work to take up and consider the truth or falsity of newspaper or magazine articles referring to Senators, then, indeed, we will do nothing but sit as sage statues passing on incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial matters.

The best thing to do with reference to newspaper articles is to apply the philosophy of the stoics. I thank the newspapers for not printing all they know about me. I am not worried about publicity. I think a great many men in public life overestimate publicity and seek it on occasion when it is not necessary.

Of course, the Senate has the right to demand that the Judiciary Committee suspend its investigation of constitutions and laws and policies which make peoples great and strong, and give attention to these small matters. I do not wish to be unparliamentary in referring to the resolution of a Senator as "small", but I believe when his temples are crowned with silver he will be ashamed of a resolution of this kind.

I repeat, I shall not defy the Senate. If the Senate demands that the Judiciary Committee investigate this matter, the committee can do it, but I shall not have anything to do with it. I have no time to waste with such matters. I am busy with important affairs rather than with small ones.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not understand that any request has been made for the present consideration of the resolution.

It is regrettable that the time of the Senate should be occupied in the consideration of such matters. My understanding is that the request was that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is that correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the request as understood by the present occupant of the Chair, and the resolution will be so referred.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the resolution to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Should it not go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest that a special committee be appointed to consider the resolution and that the committee be designated as the "Committee on the Disposition of Useless and Unnecessary Resolutions." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand the resolution has already been referred to the Judiciary Committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the order of the Chair.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs in order that it may be reconsidered in the light of additional evidence to be submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted, as requested.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it will be impossible to consider and dispose of the bill under the present order. I suggest that it be passed over with a view to recurring to it and making it the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 365) for the relief of Capt. James W. Darr was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand it is the intention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], chairman of the subcommittee, is charged with the handling of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 3587, being the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Title I—General appropriations—Legislative", on page 2, after line 2, to insert:

SENATE

To pay to Ellen E. Murphy, widow of Hon. Louis Murphy, late a Senator from the State of Iowa, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 5, to insert:

To pay to Lydia Norbeck, widow of Hon. Peter Norbeck, late a Senator from the State of South Dakota, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I think a brief statement ought to be made at this point. The Senate will note that there is the customary appropriation of $10,000 each to the widows of the late Senator Murphy and the late Senator Norbeck. I merely wish to state that the item of the customary appropriation in the case of the widow of the late Senator Couzens is not included at the specific written request of Mrs. Couzens.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, after line 8, to insert:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1937, $160,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the amendment just read. Does he care to make a statement as to the items included in that rather general and omnibus provision?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Utah and other Senators I will state that the item represents principally an appropriation for the additional secretaries who have been provided for Senators. Under the statute we have four secretaries. This covers the item of the additional secretaries and some other assistance and services in connection with the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 2, lines 9 and 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 10, to insert:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, fiscal year 1937, $125,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for services, personal, professional, or otherwise, in excess of the rate of $3,600 per annum: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for per diem and subsistence expenses except in accordance with the Subsistence Expense Act of 1926, approved June 3, 1926, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 22, to insert:

Office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper: For two laborers, from February 1 to June 30, 1937, at the rate of $1,260 per annum each, $1,050.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 4, to insert:

JOINT COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

For the payment of the salaries and other expenses of the Joint Committee on Government Organization as authorized by law, fiscal year 1937, to remain available during the fiscal year 1938, $30,000, one-half of such amount to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Executive—Independent offices—Relief and work relief", on page 5, line 6, after the word "thereof", to strike out "$790,000,000" and insert "$775,000,000", so as to read:

To continue to provide relief and work relief as authorized in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, and subject to all the provisions thereof, $775,000,000, which amount shall be added to, and proportionately increase the specified amounts of the limitations prescribed under, the appropriation made in such act.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I believe it would be helpful to the procedure to allow that item to go over for the present. There are one or more controversies relating to the amendment. If the Senator from Colorado approves of that course, I ask that that be done.

Mr. ADAMS. That is satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the item will be passed over temporarily.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 16, after the word "thereof", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of the funds carried in this appropriation shall be used to pay more than one-half of 1 percent of the total number of persons appointed or employed in an administrative or supervisory capacity within any State who were nonresidents of the State at the time of the appointment or employment of such persons, nor shall more than 1 percent of the total amount allocated out of this appropriation for expenditures for any purpose within any State be paid as salaries, wages, or other compensation to persons appointed or employed in an administrative or supervisory capacity who were not bona-fide residents of such State at the time of appointment or employment but the provisions of this proviso shall not apply to any projects administered by the War Department.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I presume the object of this amendment is to make it compulsory for the Works Progress Administration and other relief administrations to employ nobody in regional offices except residents of the State in which the regional office is located, although a regional office may have jurisdiction over five or six or even a dozen States.

I presume the object is to bar anybody, regardless of his qualifications or the need for his services who may be brought in to a regional office from outside of the State in which the office is located. If that is the object of the amendment, I am opposed to it.

I have just been informed by the Works Progress Administration that the adoption of the amendment would cripple its activities and would knock into a cocked hat its organization in every regional office now engaged in conducting its activities. If that is the purpose—and whether it is the purpose or not, it is certainly the effect—I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, this particular amendment was adopted by the Senate at the time of the passage of the deficiency bill at the last session. It was presented by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. The amendment was modified very materially in conference, and this is a reoffering by the junior Senator from Georgia of the language of that amendment with the intent, as I understand, to prevent what is commonly denominated as "carpetbagging", sending employees into a State or district in which they do not live. I would suggest that the Senator from Georgia be permitted to explain it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall make some remarks in my own time.

Mr. ADAMS. I am about to ask the Senator from Georgia to make a complete explanation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is this in the language of the original offering by the Senator from Georgia or in the language of a compromise reached in conference?

Mr. ADAMS. This is the language adopted by the Senate at the last session. It is not the language originally incorporated in the bill because there was a compromise made in the conference committee.

Mr. RUSSELL obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Would the Senator be willing to have the amendment amended by including, in line 20, after the word "State", words such as these?—

For the purpose of performing services relating exclusively to work within the State.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I would gladly accept the suggestion of the Senator from Washington. Of course, no one has any idea of attempting to limit the employees of any regional office to citizens of the State where the regional office might be located. If the amendment would have that effect, it certainly is not intended, and as the author of the amendment, I should be delighted to accept any verbiage that would avoid that effect. This amendment was offered when the bill appropriating the $1,450,000,000 was pending at the last session of the Congress, and was adopted by the Senate. At that time it provoked some little discussion on the floor.

Mr. President, in some of the States there has been an unreasonable policy on the part of the Works Progress Administration. Ofttimes, at the expense of the Government, they have sent people into States from other States to take many of the more attractive supervisory positions. I do not accept the implication that there is a State of this Union which does not have within its borders citizens of sufficient integrity and ability to carry on and direct all of the supervisory and administrative work of the State division of the Works Progress Administration. As for my own State, I resent the inference that there are not citizens of my State who are capable of directing all of this work, and I resent the Works Progress Administration sending people from other States to fill positions strictly within my State, when there are on the reemployment rolls of the State the names of citizens in the State who are looking for work, who have registered themselves, and who possess qualifications which are equal or superior to those of the people sent into the State.

People have been sent into my State to direct the athletic activities of the Works Progress Administration in the city of Atlanta—people from remote sections, who know nothing of the life and habits and manners of living of the people of my State, to take jobs which pay $250 to $300 a month, when there are on the rolls of the reemployment agency in Atlanta the names of any number of people looking for that kind of work who cannot obtain employment.

I say the Congress should take this matter in hand. We have appropriated these funds lavishly and without any strings, due to the great emergency confronting us; but surely there are those in every State capable of carrying on the work in the particular State of an administrative and supervisory character.

Mr. President, there are differences in the kinds of work and the characteristics of those who do the work in the various sections of the Nation. People who have always lived within the State and are familiar with local conditions could do the work more efficiently than those imported from other States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the Senator's attitude, and I have a good deal of sympathy with it. I do not think that in purely State activities there should be a considerable number of employees sent in from other States to supervise the work wholly within a State, or to perform services within a State where there are qualified men and women in the State who might do the work. But there are instances in which there are regional offices, for instance, comprising half a dozen States. Certainly five out of six States, in such a situation, ought not to be barred from the right to have their citizens considered for any work that deals with the regional situation, and I am wondering whether the Senator would accept an amendment of this sort: On page 5, in line 20, after the word "State", to insert the words "or any region"; on line 21, after the word "State", to insert the words "or the region"; and in line 24, on the same page, after the word "State", to insert the words "or region."

Mr. RUSSELL. I would accept that amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that the requirement would be that the person employed would have to be a citizen of the State or region in which the work is proposed to be done.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no intention or desire to hamper the regional offices.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on account of the noise in the Chamber I could not hear the amendment suggested.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment I suggest, and which the Senator from Georgia seems willing to accept, is that in line 20, after the word "State", there be inserted the words "or any region"; on line 21, after the word "State", to insert the words "or the region", and on the same page, in line 24, after the word "State", to insert the words "or region", so that it would not require the Works Progress Administration to limit its employees to the State in which a regional office might be located, but would empower them to consider qualified employees in the entire region over which the office had jurisdiction.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that either the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kentucky or the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington would be wholly acceptable to the committee. I know it would be acceptable to me as the author of the committee amendment. I think it would certainly make it clear that there is no desire to interfere with the regions. The difference between the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington and that proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky would limit the employees of the regional offices to those living within the region, whereas the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington merely provides that those who are employed in the State organization should be residents of the State.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not get the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I have no pride of authorship, but I do think that the amendment I have offered would meet the situation a little better than the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not get the force of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I suggest that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 5, line 20, after the word "State", to insert the words "for the purpose of performing services relating exclusively to work within the State."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Are there any limitations upon the Works Progress Administration or its officials in limiting or delimiting the boundaries of the regions? May they set up a region today and then change the boundaries to include or exclude States not within the contemplation when the region was first established?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not know that I can answer that question. I do not think any of the regions are fixed by any statute. They are determined by the administrative rulings and orders.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we cannot hear the discussion; there is so much confusion on the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there is no provision in the law limiting the authority of the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration with respect to the location of regional offices or the number of States which he may allocate to any region. That is an administrative matter which all these emergency agencies have conducted as they have seen fit to do, attempting to group States according to their geographical location and the similarity of the problems which they face; but there is no law prohibiting the Administrator from changing them from time to time.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish simply to place in the RECORD, in order to make the discussion a little clearer, the provision of the deficiency bill which was agreed to last year by the conference committee and adopted by the two Houses as a substitute or compromise. It is as follows:

> Appointments to Federal positions of an administrative or advisory capacity under the foregoing appropriation in any State shall be made from among the bona-fide residents of that State, so far as not inconsistent with efficient administration.

I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether or not he feels that that has been lived up to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I might say that in the case to which I have referred, when an athletic director from another State was sent into my State to have jurisdiction within the city of Atlanta, I was so outraged that I took the matter up with the Comptroller General of the United States and requested him to inform me whether this man could draw his salary. I have here a letter from the Comptroller General, in which he cites the provision of the law referred to, and says:

> You will note that the provision as finally enacted is merely directory to the appointing authorities, rather than an inhibition or a limitation as to the use of the appropriated funds. Furthermore, the direction that the appointments be made from among the bona-fide residents of the State is qualified by the phrase "so far as not inconsistent with efficient administration." This virtually leaves the matter entirely in the hands of the administrative officer in charge.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the junior Senator from Georgia yield to his colleague?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GEORGE. May I also call the attention of my colleague to the fact that there is no protection provided in the amendment that was carried in the deficiency bill of last year?

Mr. RUSSELL. It was merely a suggestion, to which the authorities are not compelled to pay the slightest attention. It does not prevent transferring people from one section to another.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; and it did not relate, or undertake to relate, to the status of the appointee at the time of his appointment.

Mr. RUSSELL. It did not affect that at all.

Mr. GEORGE. If he was already in the service.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. As I stated a few moments ago, I have no pride of authorship in the amendment which I have proposed. The objection I have to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky is merely this: As the Senator from Utah has pointed out, there is nothing in the law which fixed the boundaries or size of regions. If, after we pass this law, the Works Progress Administration should say, "We will have two regions in the United States, one east of the Mississippi and one west of the Mississippi", so far as this amendment is concerned, they could bring people from Maine to Georgia, or from Texas up to the State of Washington.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, there is no danger of them bringing people from Texas, I will say.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. We have no objection to them appointing people from Texas; but it seems to me that the amendment which the Senator from Kentucky proposes would be ineffectual to meet the situation presented by the Senator from Georgia. What the Senator from Georgia desires is to keep people from being brought from outside of a State to do State work. My amendment, I think, would meet the object of the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. In my judgment, the amendment of the Senator from Washington would meet the situation so far as the State office is concerned. I judge that the Senator from Kentucky and others believe that the regional office should attempt to secure its employees from the region represented by the regional office. If there should be a division of the United States into two regions only, that would necessitate a reduction of regional offices to two, and if that should occur, it would be proper to draw the employees of that regional office from all of the States included within the region.

Some time ago I had some figures as to the employees in a regional office, and I found that in a region which is composed, as I recall it, of three States, there were fewer than 500 employees in the regional office, and 420 of them came from one of the three States. In that situation, naturally, there was not an adequate number of representatives in the regional office from the other two States with a knowledge of affairs within those States to transact the business coming from their States.

I myself am strongly in favor not only of the limitation suggested by the Senator from Washington, but I am in favor of the limitation suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. It is my belief that if all of these departments would recognize that they would obtain better cooperation, in connection with their work, by distributing the employment in the regional office among representatives from the various States within the region, they would help very materially in the proper execution of their work, and if the words suggested by the Senator from Kentucky are not sufficient in their limitation or in the definition of their boundary to accomplish the purpose which he desires, I sincerely hope that someone will suggest other language which will accomplish his purpose.

I may state that a short time ago there came into my city of Birmingham a very estimable and able gentleman from a city in a neighboring State to take charge of the branch office of a certain institution which was doing business in Alabama. This gentleman was sent from the home office of the Government agency over into Alabama. He was a resident of the State in which the home office was located. He had never resided in the State of Alabama for a minute in his entire life. He was not familiar with the business in the State of Alabama which he was sent to control in this branch agency.

I am very heartily in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] if it will accomplish the purpose sought. If it will not, I hope someone will suggest language which will accomplish the purpose.

In my judgment, this discussion, however, will show exactly what was intended, to wit, that with reference to employment in the State offices of various governmental agencies, the employees, so far as possible, and within the limitations mentioned, shall be residents of the State in which the work is done. Further, that with reference to regional offices it is the belief of this body that there should be, so far as possible, a fair representation and apportionment of employees within the entire region to serve in the regional office, and that the regional office shall not go a thousand miles away from the region to bring in those who are not familiar with the particular problems of that region. That, as I understand, is the purpose sought by the Senator from Kentucky in his amendment, and I believe that that represents largely the viewpoint of the Members of this body.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I reiterate my conviction that as the amendment is drawn by the committee it would even limit the employees in a regional office to the State in which the office is located, and would not permit the diffusion of such employees over the other States of which such regional office had supervision. Of course, this applies to more administrations than the W. P. A., because, for example, out of this fund the President can in the future, as he has in the past, allocate funds to the Resettlement Administration.

It happens that there is a regional office in the city of Raleigh, N. C., which has jurisdiction over Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, West Virginia, Kentucky, and, I think, Tennessee. Of course, with respect to the work done in the regional office in Raleigh, the employee is probably physically limited to the office in that city, unless the work is of a supervisory nature that would call for his being sent out as an inspector or in a similar capacity in all the other States included within that region, and the amendment as drawn by the committee, I think, could be subject to the interpretation that every man and every woman who physically worked in or whose limitations were within the boundaries of the State, would have to be selected from that State and would give no leeway at all in the selection of employees from the other States included within the region.

The amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], by limiting the language to apply to work done exclusively within the State, I think would apply to those who do regional work, although they are physically limited to the office of the regional headquarters in any city. For that reason I think that while the importation of men from outside the region would be permitted, and, as he suggested, employees could be brought in from anywhere in the United States to any regional office, his amendment would not cure the interpretation which I fear would be placed upon the language, that so long as regional employees should by telephone or by mail or by any supervisory methods deal with problems in five or six States, while they are physically located in their headquarters in the city, they would have to be chosen from the State in which they actually did the work, and in that case I think the proposed language would be even more restrictive than the suggestion which I offered, though I hope we can agree on language which will accomplish what we seek to accomplish.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this amendment was amended two or three times in the committee, and it is wholly likely, from a careful reading of it, that it is subject to the criticism made by the Senator from Kentucky. I personally feel that either of the amendments, the one offered by the Senator from Washington or the one offered by the Senator from Kentucky, would achieve what I am seeking to accomplish, and that is to prevent persons from outside the State being sent in to take supervisory positions within the State organization. Personally, I think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky is perhaps a bit more desirable, because it would limit to the region the personnel that administered the work within that region.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Could not we accomplish the purpose of all the Senators by adopting both the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] by simply inserting on page 5, in line 20, after the word "State", the words "or region", and then add the words of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, "for the purpose of performing services relating exclusively to work within the State"? Thereby both purposes would be accomplished.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is the suggestion I made.

Mr. RUSSELL. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky was to insert the words "or region."

Mr. MINTON. He was putting in the words "or region" without incorporating the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. RUSSELL. There is certainly no conflict between the two proposed amendments, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was interested in the statement which the Senator read from a letter addressed to him by the Comptroller General, indicating that the language to which attention was called by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], and which is the present law, was wholly disregarded or apparently was wholly disregarded by the administration. I was wondering if with these proposed amendments, if they shall be accepted, the bill then will be sufficiently mandatory in its character so as to compel the agency or agencies that are embraced in the bill to follow the terms and the spirit and the letter of the act?

Mr. RUSSELL. I certainly hope that that will be accomplished, because that is undoubtedly the purpose of the amendment. I might say to the Senate, however, that the language that finally found itself in the bill as the result of the conference was scarcely directive. It was mildly suggestive that they employ persons living within the State. I do not think that the Works Progress Administration has violated any language of any act of Congress, however far they may have departed from the intention of the Congress as made manifest by this amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The last clause of the amendment which the Senator quoted destroyed all that went before.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. In order to hold down the departments you have to tie them both hands and feet, and draw an amendment containing limitations out of which they cannot wiggle.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think it ought to be called to the attention of the Senate that we are considering a deficiency bill. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] was offered when the appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1937, was being drafted. That amendment was adopted by the Senate but it was rejected by the House, and the Senate then concurred in the action of the House. The Congress decided by concurrent action of both houses not to place this limitation in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act for the year 1937. Now we are engaged in supplying certain deficiencies. It seems to me to be quite manifest that it would be rather improper in the middle of the fiscal year to attach to a deficiency bill a rider which would perhaps have the effect of undoing the policies which have been placed in operation as the result of previous action of Congress.

I sympathize with a great deal of what the Senator has said, and I feel that Congress should exercise considerable restraint upon the Executive agencies; but we are not dealing here with W. P. A. alone, nor with the Resettlement Administration. We are dealing with the Public Works Administration and with every other emergency agency.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I might point out to the Senator from Wyoming that the relief appropriation for the last year was carried in a deficiency bill; it was carried in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act for the year 1936. We ought to have an opoprtunity to place limitations on the expenditure of these relief funds in the bill appropriating the funds. Last year the relief appropriation was carried in a deficiency bill, the first deficiency bill of 1936. We now find ourselves with another deficiency bill which carries the appropriation for this relief and work-relief agency. The appropriation of money for this agency could be made only in the deficiency bills, for it is not provided for in any regular appropriation bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The deficiency in question is for the year 1937. The Appropriations Committee will be confronted with this problem within a few months, and it seems to me that at that time we may go into the entire matter.

I may also point out that a reorganization committee has been appointed in both Houses of Congress, and that the President has recommended to Congress the establishment of a department of public works. Obviously, it is going to be necessary for us to go into this entire matter.

I may say that I hold in my hand a memorandum showing that the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936 contained the following language:

> Appointments to Federal positions of an administrative or supervisory capacity under the foregoing appropriation in any State shall be made from among the bona-fide residents of that State so far as not inconsistent with efficient administration.

I am advised by the W. P. A. that it has made a conscientious effort to carry out that provision. I cannot say with certainty, but I think the Senator will agree that the Committee on Appropriations had no real opportunity to make an investigation as to whether or not the provision has been complied with.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator evidently was not on the floor when I pointed out that that language was contained in the bill; that, despite that language, an employee was sent within my State to direct purely State activities, such as athletic directors in the city of Atlanta, Ga.; and that I filed a protest with the Comptroller General of the United States, asking him to give some force and effect to that language by stopping the payment of the salaries of such employees; and I was advised by him that the language was merely directive; that it was left to the discretion of the appointing agencies.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. My feeling is that it would be unwise at this time to adopt the amendment of the Senator, and that we should allow the matter to go until the Appropriations Committee considers the appropriation for the ensuing year for the relief agency, at which time it would be possible to discuss the entire subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Suppose that since the former bill was passed evidence has been brought to the attention of the Appropriations Committee or to the attention of the Senate that a provision which was inserted in that law has been disregarded, does the Senator think that we ought not to legislate for the remainder of the year and to make such provisions in the terms of this appropriation as will prevent a continuance of the evils?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that if there were such evidence, that might be necessary, but nothing of that kind appears in the hearings, as I understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The provision read by the Senator from Wyoming attempts to limit these employees to the State or region in which they are employed, subject, of course, to the exception that if there be some expert or some person peculiarly qualified to deal with a particular situation and if a person so qualified cannot be found in the State or region, the W. P. A. or any of these other agencies may send such employees in from the outside. Of course, whenever anybody is sent into our States from the outside we usually regard that as prima facie evidence that somebody in the State who is equally if not better qualified has been ignored, but that is not necessarily proof of the fact.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is true, but I am not concerned at this moment about the merit of these allegations.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand the Senator's attitude.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. They may be true, and I think we ought to find out whether or not they are true, and if it be true that any of the agencies have violated the clear direction of Congress, then they should be made to feel it. What I am pointing out, however, is that to adopt this amendment at this time, upon this appropriation bill, will mean that it will become effective immediately, and, as a result, there will undoubtedly have to be discharged hundreds of employees who have accepted their appointment in good faith and who knew nothing about this proposal and who will, perhaps, as a result, be placed almost on the doorsteps of Senators looking for other appointments. Let us not disrupt the organization.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, there has been no proof produced before the committee or before the Senate up to this moment that in a single case the administrator has violated the spirit or letter of this provision.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Nothing beyond what the Senator from Georgia has just stated.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will accept the Senator's word about that, of course. In his particular case there may have been at least a close question as to whether somebody else is better qualified than the person he may have had in mind.

Mr. RUSSELL. I may say I have nobody on earth in mind; it is not a question of patronage at all. I have never made any very serious effort to have anyone employed by the W. P. A. in any supervisory capacity within my own State or within any regional office. It is a matter of principle. I think it is fundamentally wrong to take these funds appropriated for relief and work relief and to use them to pay the salaries of those who are transported from one end to the other of the country and called upon to act under conditions with which they cannot be fully familiar and ofttimes to have large mileage accounts built up at the expense of the Government to pay for transportation.

Mr. BARKLEY. At the same time, if the Senator will yield further, lack of familiarity with a local situation may be overcome sometimes by long experience and qualifications in the type of work which is necessary to be done in the particular locality, which would offset I think the desirability of having local employees.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DUFFY. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming, that, if the departments have carried out the spirit of the direction which was given, there should not be any considerable number of people that might lose their jobs at this time. I am of the belief that several of the departments, at least, have just chosen to ignore that provision. If they have carried it out, nobody would be greatly harmed, and there would not be any trouble if we should make the provision mandatory in the law.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say, in response to the Senator from Wisconsin, it is only necessary to point out the wording of the amendment, which reads:

> That no part of the funds carried in this appropriation shall be used to pay more than one-half of 1 percent of the total number of persons appointed.

"One-half of 1 percent of the total number of persons appointed" reminds one of the famous amendment which was recently repealed by the action of the people of the United States. But obviously one-half of 1 percent is so infinitesimal a number that the effect of the amendment, if adopted, cannot help but be to cripple every regional office in the country.

Let me add that I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Georgia that the administration of these appropriations should be, to the largest extent possible, committed to organizations and to employees drawn from the several States. I view with a good deal of dissatisfaction, and even with apprehension, the system which has grown up of establishing regional headquarters which seem to threaten perhaps the future integrity of the States, but I submit this is not the place to correct that error, if error it be; it ought to be corrected on a general bill after an opportunity for hearings.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I have listened with very much interest to the argument, and, while I agree fully with my colleague and also with the Senator from Georgia, I have not said anything because Kentucky has been accepting money from the Federal Government that has been given to it to relieve its citizens, and I have always been a firm believer in the old adage that one should not "look a gift horse in the mouth." So long as the States do not contribute their part to carry out the purposes of legislation of this character, I do not see what right they have to complain or any reason for them to complain if the Federal Government prefers to send those not residing in the State into the particular jurisdiction. If the State wants to do its part, which it should do, of course—and it should not get any money, in my judgment, unless it did do its part—it would have every right to complain if men from the outside were sent in to administer relief. So until the States do their part, I cannot see much reason for them to complain of what is given to them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky suggest a further observation. I am speaking now particularly of the Works Progress Administration. In order economically to administer the funds placed at the disposal of the Works Progress Administration and to carry out the duty which was imposed upon it, namely, of meeting the relief situation, it has been essential for that agency to appoint individuals who travel from State to State.

The Works Progress Administration, to a greater extent than any other emergency agency, has operated through the States. In every instance of which I am aware the head of the Works Progress Administration has appointed as State directors persons from the particular States involved. There are also field officers of the W. P. A. It is not at all clear that such field officers are exempted from this amendment. As a matter of fact, my own opinion is that they would not be exempted. Therefore, it seems clear to me that the adoption of this amendment would so cripple the administration of this fund that within 2 months the President and the Budget and the Works Progress Administration would have to be back here asking for additional funds in order to repair the destruction wrought by this amendment adopted in the middle of a fiscal year.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while the amendment may be adopted in the middle of a fiscal year, 5 months of the year still remain, and here is an appropriation of three-quarters of a billion dollars with respect to which the Congress is simply making an expression of its own view and opinion that in State offices all but one-half of 1 percent at least of the personnel occupying administrative or advisory positions should be composed of citizens of the State.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator believe that it refers only to State offices?

Mr. GEORGE. I was going to say the Senator did not hear all the discussion that preceded his arrival in the Chamber. It has been stated by my colleague, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who offered the amendment in the committee that he was quite willing to accept amendments which would restrict the administrative and supervisory personnel of a State office to the employment of people within the particular State and at a regional office to people within the region.

However, I fail to see any force in the Senator's suggestion that, being in the midst of a fiscal year, we cannot impose reasonable restrictions upon the expenditure of such a significant sum as three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I interrupt the Senator there——

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. To say that the distinction I make is that if it were adopted upon this appropriation bill the amendment would become immediately effective, whereas if it were attached to a regular appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, then each one of the agencies would have notice. Now none of them have notice, and it would be the inevitable result that numerous employees would be immediately cut off from their positions.

Mr. GEORGE. I may say to the Senator that I do not think there is any agency of the Government that can truthfully assert that its attention has not been called from time to time to the very abuse which this amendment seeks to prevent, for the Congress has undertaken to prevent it. There can be, it seems to me, no excuse for the Congress to refuse to give direction as to the expenditure of a sum of money of this great consequence that must be expended during the period of 5 months by the extraordinary agencies that have been set up. All the more, Mr. President, should that be true when it is recalled that we have appropriated money virtually without restriction upon its expenditure, and we have relied upon the Administrator to deal fairly in the distribution of the offices within the States.

It is not because my colleague desires, certainly not because I desire, to put the citizens of a State within a State office; but when a Senator of the United States is appealed to because of the importation of some persons from a long distance, and when he makes his protest, and when his protest is utterly disregarded, then it is time that the Senate should exercise some authority over the fund which it appropriates. It is embarrassing to me to have my constituents ask, "Did you not know how this money would be expended? Has the Senate no control over the manner of the expenditure of such large sums of money?" I have had to answer that we were told we were in a great emergency; that the President said so, and I accepted his word; I knew it to be true. I was willing to leave to the President the widest discretion in the expenditure of the money; but when we come finally to say to those chosen to administer the fund that with respect to the supervisory and administrative officers within a State office or regional office, "You shall remain within the State or the region to find your personnel", it seems to me that that is the least we could do.

The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] for whom we all have very great respect, makes the assertion that until the States do something about these appropriations the States ought not to have anything to say about them. That, as I understand, is his suggestion. He framed it in a little more polite phraseology by saying that he never believed in "looking a gift horse in the mouth", but Mr. President, there is not any of this three-quarters of a billion dollars that does not come, in part, from every American State. It comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers, the citizens of this country wherever they may live; and it seems to me when we have given such large discretion to the President because we deemed it necessary, as doubtless it was necessary—at least, all of us accepted it as being advisable and wise to leave to the President the widest discretion so far as the expenditure of the money is concerned—certainly that being the case, there is all the more reason why we should, at the time we appropriate the money, whether at the beginning or the end of a fiscal year, whether it becomes immediately available or available at some future date, say, "With respect to the advisory and administrative personnel of the State and regional offices you shall stay within the respective States or within the particular region for the greater part or number of your State and regional force."

I hope very much the amendment may be agreed to. It will be a simple matter in conference for the amendment to be so worded as to express what I feel the Senate really desires to do—and that is to say to the administrators, "With respect to your State personnel, stay within the State, and, with respect to your regional personnel, stay within your region."

Mr. McKELLAR. "Or divide them ratably."

Mr. GEORGE. I would not even say "ratably." That would be within the spirit of it; but I would not say "ratably" because it might be that within a region they could get a greater number of administrators from a particular State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will yield, I should like to address an inquiry to the attention of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. GEORGE. I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BARKLEY. We are all aware, of course, of the terrific flood which has taken such an unprecedented toll of life and property in the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and in the valleys of their tributaries. The Administrator of the Works Progress Administration is now on his way to Memphis, if he is not already there, as chairman of a commission appointed by the President to make an investigation of the damage in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys as the result of the flood.

I am already beginning to receive telegrams from mayors and county officers all up and down the Ohio Valley asking not only that the W. P. A. but the War Department and the P. W. A. should hasten engineers and experts into those towns to make an official investigation and survey of the damage which has been done by the flood, in order that attempts may be made to remedy the situation either out of the fund which we are now about to appropriate or out of additional funds which may be required.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We might send one-half of 1 percent of the Army down there.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think it would apply to the Army.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Neither do I.

Mr. BARKLEY. But it would apply to employees of the W. P. A. Inasmuch as Mr. Hopkins has been made chairman of the commission, and for other reasons, I imagine that he probably will be put in charge of the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys. What effect will the language have upon his ability to send engineers into my home city, for instance, whose mayor or city manager is appealing to me to send experts to make a survey of the damage in that city, and into the city of Louisville, or Cincinnati, or Cairo, or Memphis, or anywhere else in the flooded area, no matter where the engineers come from, in order that they may do an efficient job? The very fact I am being appealed to by local authorities to send such experts shows upon its face that they do not have available at home the assistance which is required.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is absolutely impossible to mobilize facilities known to be needed in an emergency of this kind unless we have proper provision of law to that end. The exemption applies to only one-half of 1 percent. Every other person must be a bona-fide resident at the time of appointment or employment of the State in which he is employed. Every Member of this body knows that the legal requirements as to residence vary in the different States.

It will be a requirement almost impossible of performance to impose upon the Works Progress Administration and other relief agencies at this time the necessity to determine whether all the persons now employed were at the time of their appointment and employment bona-fide residents. Some States require 2 years residence, some 1 year, and some 5 years. It seems to me to be utterly unwise at this time to adopt such a provision.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I suggest to Senators that the Director of the Works Progress Administration put the Appropriations Committee on notice that he would be completely out of funds by the middle of this week? If we are going to discuss every item in this bill for the length of time we are discussing this comparatively inconsequential item, we will not get the bill passed next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] whether he has offered his amendment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment. I think the amendment which I offered and the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] should be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, in line 20, in the committee amendment, after the word "State", it is proposed to insert the words "for the purpose of performing services relating exclusively to work within the State", so as to read:

That no part of the funds carried in this appropriation shall be used to pay more than one-half of 1 percent of the total number of persons appointed or employed in an administrative or supervisory capacity within any State for the purpose of performing services relating exclusively to work within the State who were nonresidents of the State at the time of the appointment or employment of such persons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. I now offer formally the amendment which I have suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 20, in the committee amendment, after the word "State", the Senator from Kentucky proposes to insert the words "or any region."

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he does not think the words "or region" should be inserted in line 21, after the word "State"?

Mr. BARKLEY. My amendment applies in several places: page 5, line 20, after the word "State", to insert the words "or any region"; in line 21, after the word "State", to insert the words "or the region"; and in line 24, after the word "State", to insert the words "or region."

Mr. POPE. Then, on page 6, line 3, should not the same amendment be offered?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; after the word "State" in line 3, page 6, the words "or region" should be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 5, line 20, after the word "State", it is proposed to insert the words "or any region"; in line 21, after the word "State", to insert the words "or the region"; in line 24, after the word "State," to insert the words "or region"; and on page 6, line 3, after the word "State", to insert the words "or region", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That no part of the funds carried in this appropriation shall be used to pay more than one-half of 1 percent of the total number of persons appointed or employed in an administrative or supervisory capacity within any State or any region for the purpose of performing services relating exclusively to work within the State who were nonresidents of the State or the region at the time of the appointment or employment of such persons, nor shall more than 1 percent of the total amount allocated out of this appropriation for expenditures for any purpose within any State or region be paid as salaries, wages, or other compensation to persons appointed or employed in an administrative or supervisory capacity who were not bona-fide residents of such State or region at the time of appointment or employment, but the provisions of this proviso shall not apply to any projects administered by the War Department.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not desire to have brought into this debate this awful catastrophe which has been visited on one great section of our country. I certainly should not like to have any act of mine hamper or hinder the fullest measure of relief to those who are suffering from the results of flood. My personal judgment is that this provision might be very helpful, but if the Senator from Kentucky is apprehensive unless it might cripple or hinder the work for the relief of those who are suffering from the flood, I move an amendment, on page 6, line 5, after the word "to", to insert the words "flood relief or", so the sentence would read:

The provisions of this proviso shall not apply to flood relief or any projects administered by the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are amendments now pending. Let us dispose of those first.

Mr. RUSSELL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendments offered by the Senator from Kentucky to the committee amendment will be considered as one and voted upon en bloc. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia is now in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. On page 6, line 5, after the word "to", I move to amend by inserting the words "flood relief or."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 5, in the committee amendment, after the word "to", it is proposed to insert the words "flood relief or", so as to read:

The provisions of this proviso shall not apply to flood relief or any projects administered by the War Department.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am afraid that language is not sufficiently comprehensive. "Flood relief" might be considered to mean rescuing and feeding sufferers, and not to apply to reconstruction work after the flood subsides. I think better language would be that "this provision shall not apply to rehabilitation or construction work made necessary by floods or to any projects administered by the War Department."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] if in his opinion the amendment which he submitted would exclude from the operations of the original amendment the field officers of the Works Progress Administration, wherever they may be?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, as a result of the amendment which I offered, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] would deal exclusively with employees of the State administration. It would not affect field or regional officers or persons sent into a State dealing with problems outside of the State or temporarily dealing with problems within the State.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Works Progress Administration found it necessary, in order to carry out any part of the great program which it is attempting to carry out, it would not be affected by the limitation of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. So long as the work of the field officer included work in other States aside from the State in which he was then located.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Very well. Suppose in the administration of relief it should become necessary for the Works Progress Administration or the Resettlement Administration to send several agents into a particular State to work in that State in flood relief, would it not be necessary for the W. P. A. to deprive themselves of the services of the experts who had had experience in other States?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Not if they went there temporarily. The amendment reads: "Performing services exclusively" relative to work within the State. If a man comes from a neighboring State he may work there 3 months, but his services are not exclusively with reference to the work within that State. He may work another 3 months in another State.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to the committee amendment. The amendment to the amendment will be stated again.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 6, line 5, after the word "to", it is proposed to insert the words "flood relief or" so as to read:

The provisions of this proviso shall not apply to flood relief or any projects administered by the War Department.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offered a substitute for that which I understood the Senator from Georgia agreed to accept. After the word "to" I proposed to insert the words "rehabilitation or construction work made necessary by flood or to."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is that acceptable to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the words "flood relief" should also be retained. I have no objection to the additional language suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let the language I have offered follow the words "flood relief" offered by the Senator from Georgia, so it would read:

The provisions of this proviso shall not apply to flood relief or rehabilitation or construction work made necessary by flood or to any projects administered by the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment be stated as now offered by the Senator from Georgia and modified by the Senator from Kentucky.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 5, in the committee amendment, after the word "to", it is proposed to insert the words:

flood relief or rehabilitation or construction work made necessary by flood or to.

So as to make the sentence read:

But the provisions of this proviso shall not apply to flood relief or rehabilitation or construction work made necessary by flood or to any projects administered by the War Department.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 6, at the end of the committee amendment, it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That this proviso shall not be construed to apply to any field office of the Works Progress Administration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire why the Senator makes that exemption?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Because the field officers are supervisory over the various State officers, and it may be necessary for the Works Progress Administration to send them here and there, as the case may be. I referred a moment ago to drought relief. The drought situation is still very serious in many of the Western States, as the Senator from Utah well knows. While the floods are causing great damage in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, the drought is causing just as much damage in some of the other States. I do not wish to see the Service crippled by reason of the committee amendment. Therefore I am offering the amendment providing that field services may be excluded. That would be the result of making this limitation apply solely to the State offices.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not only will the Works Progress Administration be called upon to do a large amount of relief work in connection with floods and droughts, but the Resettlement Administration is doing the same thing.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. They have field men and they have field offices, and if the Senator's amendment limits the exemption to the Works Progress Administration, it would not apply to the field offices or field representatives of the Resettlement Administration or to any other of the emergency Administrations which are doing a job wherever it is needed to be done by men who are qualified to do it. It seems to me that, instead of limiting it to the W. P. A., the Senator ought to make it broad enough to apply to any field office or any field representative.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to do that, and I shall change the amendment to read:

Provided, however, That this proviso shall not be construed to apply to the field office of any agency to which any funds from this appropriation may be allocated.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Wyoming define, for the benefit of the Senate, what is a "field office."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say to the Senator from Georgia that I conceive a field office to be one to which it may be necessary for the agencies at Washington to send employees, from time to time, offices which may operate throughout the United States.

Of course, I may say to the Senator that it is impossible to legislate altogether intelligently upon the floor in this manner, particularly when we are dealing with a subject matter which was not made the subject of any hearing before a committee either of the House or the Senate, but if this amendment shall be adopted it will go to conference.

Mr. RUSSELL. I may say to the Senator that I did interrogate the representatives of the Works Progress Administration about this amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Very briefly, the Senator did, that is true; but there was no time to bring out the facts with respect to the various agencies in the various States.

If this amendment is adopted upon the floor, the whole question can go to conference, and the conferees can work out an amendment which will be satisfactory.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. In the inclusion of the words "field office", does the Senator from Wyoming accept the definition I accepted, that it is a temporary office?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can appreciate the difficulty the Senator would encounter in finding adequate phraseology, but will he, if he can, define what is a "field office"? In my State, for instance, there have been activities of the Resettlement Administration, an organization which has been extravagant and wasteful in the highest degree; to my knowledge they have sent out a large number of individuals from time to time ostensibly, I suppose, as field men. They would make a cursory examination and pass on, and another so-called field man—though probably he was given a higher title—would come and traverse the same ground and reach no conclusion.

I venture to say that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been unwisely expended by so-called investigators and field officers and men who are constantly traveling from State to State, ostensibly for the purpose of making examinations.

If this amendment is to apply to the Resettlement organization, with all of its delinquencies and inefficiencies, I shall be inclined to vote against it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the Committee on Appropriations made a very substantial cut in the appropriation for the Resettlement Administration. In answer to what the Senator has said I can only repeat what I have already stated, that by the adoption of this amendment the whole matter would be sent to conference, and the conferees undoubtedly would make a serious effort to work out a solution which would be generally satisfactory.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, may the amendment be again stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 6, line 6, after the word "Department" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, however, That this proviso shall not be construed to apply to the field office of any agency to which any funds from this appropriation may be allocated.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber a moment ago. What was done with the amendment of the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee on page 5?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. What happened to the committee amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on the committee amendment has not been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. The pending amendment is to a different part of the bill. Has the committee amendment been passed over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment, as the Chair understands, is the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment found on page 6, at the end of line 6.

Mr. NORRIS. I desired to speak briefly to the committee amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, would the Senator from Nebraska permit this proposed amendment to the amendment to be acted upon before he takes the floor?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Wyoming a question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the amendment of the Senator except all the field offices?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It does.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then to what does it apply?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It applies to State offices.

Mr. CONNALLY. A State office is a field office. The Department calls every office in the field a field office.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. A distinction is being made here between "State offices" and "field offices."

Mr. CONNALLY. If the amendment exempts all the field offices, there is no use adopting the provision, because everything outside of Washington is a field office. Everyone knows that. The authorities call everything outside of the city limits a field office.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In the debate——

Mr. CONNALLY. The debate is not going to control the Comptroller General.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; it controls, because it is clearly understood that by "field offices" we are now referring to the temporary agencies which are set up from time to time. I am hoping that the matter may be worked out in conference.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is exactly what the Senator from Texas does not want to see done. I do not desire to have it worked out in conference, but wish the Senate to have some say about it. Of course, the Senator from Wyoming is going to be on the conference.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I doubt that very much.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Wyoming means a certain thing, let him say it in the amendment. The Comptroller General is not going to take the Senator's speech and rule on the provisions of this amendment with that speech in mind. He is going to take the language of the amendment. I might be governed by the Senator's speech, but the Comptroller General will not be. I think it is unwise to adopt the amendment in this form, because if we do, we might as well just knock the provision out entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. We are now dealing with the part of the appropriation carrying funds for emergency relief. Last Saturday I offered an amendment, to be printed and lie on the table, striking out a proviso of the bill. It has already been agreed that committee amendments shall be voted on first. Will the adoption of the pending committee amendment to this particular appropriation bar the introduction of further amendments, after it shall be agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not bar an amendment to the text of the bill as it came from the House. The amendment of the Senator is to the House text, is it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adoption of the pending amendment would not interfere with the proposed amendment of the Senator.

The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I merely desire to offer a few remarks which it appears to me are important for us to consider.

As I understand the bill before us, it is a deficiency appropriation bill, and, as the Senator from Wyoming has very well said, it will go into effect immediately. The appropriations made in the pending bill, if I understand correctly, are to be added to the appropriations already made by general appropriation bills; and as I see it, if we pass this appropriation bill, we will, in the midst of a fiscal year, change the rules which shall govern the expenditure of some of the money provided for in the general appropriation bills. In other words, a general appropriation bill appropriated money and it fixed certain limitations. The money is about to be exhausted, and we are to appropriate additional money in a deficiency bill and are asked to change the limitations which affect the organization of the executive department which is to expend the money and carry out the provisions of the limitations.

One provision this language changes, as I see it, is that having to do with the employment of what might be called regional officers, and Senators complain that men are being appointed to regional positions in some States who come from without the State where the money must be expended. If that has been done, and the regional officials, as we might call them, who are to expend the money have now been employed under the provisions of the law which Congress passed, and we pass this bill and provide that they shall be discharged tomorrow, if the bill shall go into effect that soon, as I see it, we will disrupt the organization to the extent that we interfere with the provisions which have been made under a prior law—legitimately and legally made—and now, in the midst of their work, and in the midst of a fiscal year, all at once, without notice, we are asked to provide for additional limitations which would result in the disruption of the force by the discharge of these regional officials for the balance of the fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator have in mind the limitation which was imposed in the original bills——

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I am discussing.

Mr. KING. To which attention was called by the Senator from Colorado, under the terms of which, as I interpreted the law, persons ought not to be employed and could not be employed outside of the regions in which they officiated, or the States in which they were called upon to work.

Mr. NORRIS. That is as the Senator interprets it. Let us suppose that when it comes to executing the law the official who has to carry it out has an idea, and, on the theory that everyone is acting in good faith, that he uses his best judgment about it, which is what the law tells him to do. The Senator may think his judgment is bad, and may want to change the law so as to affect his judgment to cut off the appointments he has made, and to do that in the midst of the work, while it is progressing.

I think we ought to hesitate. I am not one who advocates that a person carrying out this law should go all over the United States and transport large numbers of people from one State to another and give them employment. I do not believe in that, and am not arguing it; from my conversations and my dealings with the regional officers I am convinced that they do not believe in it, either, but they might disagree with me or with the Senator as to whether a certain man living outside of the State, perhaps having, as they think, superior qualifications for a particular position, should be appointed as a supervisory official within the State.

It has often happened, I suppose, that in carrying out the provisions of the law in question there has been a disagreement of judgment, depending on who was carrying them out. Some persons may think that no one living out of the State should ever be employed to do this work. My attention has been called to cases where there have been sharp disputes between Senators or Members of the House of Representatives and the official who is carrying out the program of the Works Progress Administration, where claims were made on one side or the other that certain persons should be appointed. Some political machine would make out a list, or a Member of the Senate or the House would make out a list, and say, "Here are your appointees. Appoint these men." If they were not appointed, there would be trouble. Such a case may be an extreme one, but I think such things might happen.

It seems to me that we ought to respect the judgment of the men who have partially carried out this law and not change the whole machinery in the midst of the work.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I may preface the question which I am about to ask by an observation. There is certainly no infallibility upon the part of the bureaucrats. Let us assume that in the appropriation bill of the last session of Congress we interpreted the language to mean that no persons should be employed for regional positions or for State positions outside of the State or the region in which they resided, and Mr. Hopkins, or an official of any other agency, in defiance of the interpretation placed upon law and in defiance of what I conceive to be the clear interpretation and reading of its language, appointed persons, regardless of their habitat, and transferred persons from the eastern coast to the western coast, and vice versa, at great expense, and that we are called upon now to make an appropriation to cover deficiencies, deficiencies which in part were the result of an improper interpretation of the law by such official, if not a maladministration, and to say to such official, "You cannot do that during the rest of the 6 months and in connection with the expenditure of nearly six or seven hundred millions of dollars." Under those circumstances does the Senator from Nebraska think we ought to be bound to make no change, notwithstanding we are satisfied that the official's interpretation was wrong and that——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me to answer the question as far as it has gone, and when I shall have answered, then continue with another question, I shall be glad. Otherwise I may forget the first question before he has concluded.

Mr. KING. Then I will cut the question in two.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator has assumed something that I do not believe is correct. His question assumes that the official in charge of the administration of the appropriation law which is now in existence has gone out of his way, and has not followed the law. The Senator charges him almost with being maliciously intending to disrupt the law.

Mr. KING. Oh, no, Mr. President. I simply made an assumption. I did not mean what the Senator says.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I am corrected, of course, if the Senator says that. But I think the Senator's language was rather harsh against these officials.

Mr. KING. I said, "Assume that we believe it has been done."

Mr. NORRIS. I do not assume that we believe that, and I do not think we have any right to make such an assumption. However, for the sake of argument I wish to take up that assumption. As I construe the law, it did not provide as the first part of the Senator's question that the administrative officials should not go outside of the State to get any of these supervisory officers. I do not believe that that is what the law stated. I do not believe we should make that assumption.

I do not have the law before me, but it has been read in this discussion. It is very clear to me that that law gives the administrative official a discretionary power, and what I am trying to call attention to is that if we do not agree with that discretionary power or the way it is exercised we should not run to the extreme and say, "So-and-so has disregarded the law."

My own judgment is that the administrative officers—at least those with whom I have come in contact—have been trying their very best to follow the law. I have not seen anything to indicate that they want to disregard the law. I am not arguing, however, that instances may not occur such as have been cited here, where my judgment or someone else's judgment would not agree with that of the officer whose duty it is to carry out whatever law he is called upon to carry out and to exercise a discretion in the matter. What I am trying to call attention to is that, assuming that all has been done honestly so far, it is not right, as I see it, now in the midst of the game to change the rules and to discharge this man or that woman because of a limitation that we are now going to put upon an appropriation bill. It is not good legislation, it is expensive, and it means that in this work, which is a very difficult work to perform—everybody I think must admit that—we are going to interfere with the men who I assume are honestly trying to obey the laws of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If we insist that the necessities for relief know no State lines, and that in providing the money for relief we recognize no State lines, then in the administration of the relief why should we recognize and insist on State lines? If we have a job to perform, what difference does it make whether the man who is in charge of the work, if he does it well, is from Nebraska or from Kentucky? The program is a national program and not a State program. The money involved is national money and not State money. So I should like to know why we change our position when it comes to administering relief and say that its administration should be confined to those living within a particular State, but when we go to get the money and when we determine the necessity for relief we do not recognize any State lines at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is much force in what the Senator from Kentucky has said. I listened to what he said at a prior time in this debate with a great deal of interest, and I thought what he said was very applicable.

However, Mr. President, it seems to me that wherever it will not interfere with the efficient carrying on of this work, we ought to get the employees, so far as they are efficient, in the immediate vicinity of where the work is to be done. I am not particularly in favor of the establishment of a State line for such employment. I do not believe there should be an arbitrary line established, but that those living over the line in the vicinity of a project should be eligible for employment. I am more interested in having a law that will provide for carrying on this difficult task as efficiently as possible.

As the Senator from Kentucky said, the money involved is Federal money. It comes out of the Federal Treasury, and, in my judgment, a State line ought not to be so arbitrary a dividing line that it never can be crossed.

I liked the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to add the words "or region." I thought his amendment would obviate any possible difficulty and would not interfere with the present administration of the agency. But now I am afraid that the amendment will have to be construed in such way that the agency will have to discharge a great many men and women who are admittedly efficient, who have been employed because of their efficiency, and those in charge are going to be confined arbitrarily to State lines and cannot overstep them.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I take it from the question he asked me, was of the opinion that when we passed that law last year we really told the officials, "You must not go outside of the State to get any employee to do work within the State." I do not agree with that interpretation. I like the law, and it seems to me it is well to leave it as it is. If there has been an abuse of discretion, it ought to be fully investigated, of course, but I do not think we ought now to change the law. Let those in charge expend the money now in question under the same provisions of law as those they are acting under at the present time. Money has heretofore been appropriated with certain conditions attached, money to which this appropriation will be added, and I presume it will all be in one pocket.

Mr. KING. I desire to submit one proposition in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. I think, with all due respect to him, he assumes that all the moneys expended by the Federal Government in a State are being expended without the cooperation of the State or the State organizations. I know it is true in my State that we have a State organization, that appropriations have been made, and that the State organization cooperates with the Federal organization, so that the State is tremendously interested in the expenditures which are made for relief by the Federal Government. I think that is true in all the States. I know it is true in New York and in other States. So that the States are interested in the expenditures made by the Federal Government, notwithstanding provision has been made for such expenditures through appropriations by Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it not true that, under the rules and regulations of the Works Progress Administration at this time, the sponsors of any particular project select all of the employees to carry out that project, whether it be a municipality, whether it be a county, a school district, or the State, and that the Federal Government employs no one and furnishes no employee, except for an inspector, perhaps, to see that the money is properly expended? Is that not the provision of the rules and regulations today?

Mr. KING. I am not sure as to the rules and regulations, because they are very comprehensive and I have not studied them all.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me say to the Senator that if in the State of Utah there is a school district which desires money from the Works Progress Administration, then through the State organization of the Works Progress Administration the school district secures the acceptance of the project, the funds are allocated, and the school district that is sponsoring the project employs everyone who works on the project, including foremen and timekeepers. If it be a courthouse, if it be a waterworks—it does not make any difference what it is—the particular agency of the State government which uses the funds and sponsors the project employs everyone who works on the project, although the money is furnished by the Federal Government.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know what rules apply in the State represented by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], but I know that in my State no sponsor of any project has the slightest say-so in selecting the personnel working on the project. They merely put up that part of the funds required by the State Works Progress Administration, and then someone appointed by the State administration takes charge of the project, the foremen are selected by the Works Progress Administration, laborers are selected by the Works Progress Administration, and the sponsor of the project merely contributes his part of the cost of the project.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, in Kentucky, if I am correctly advised, the same rule does not apply. The complaint in Kentucky is, first, that all those employed in responsible positions are Republicans, and, next, that they have been brought in from some other county in the State, or perhaps from outside the State. There is no complaint about the efficiency of the work. The complaint is all on account of politics, or who gets the jobs, or where they come from.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the same rule had been applied in Georgia which the Senator from Kentucky says applies in his State, there would have been no complaint whatever. It is the first time I ever heard of any such rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think I have the floor. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, along with my colleague I have taken this matter up hundreds of times upon local complaints. I have spoken to persons who have been dissatisfied with the personnel at work on a particular project. I have been repeatedly advised as to the situation, and I say very frankly that I have a good deal of sympathy, if I may say so without injecting politics into the situation, for a Democrat who has worked all his life for the Democratic Party and then sees some Republican walking off with a job that he thinks he ought to have. I can understand that situation, especially in regions where, locally, the Democratic Party never had any offices and where they have fought a losing battle and have seen their local opponents win, and now some of them are seeing them win even under present conditions. But when I have taken these matters up with the State director and when my colleague has taken them up with the State director we have invariably been told—and I know the statement is true—that, while he does appoint certain inspectors and certain supervisory officers to see that the Government and the local community are not defrauded in the expenditure and that the work is efficiently done, whenever either a loan or a grant is turned over to a city mayor or city council or county officer——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking of local agencies. The W. P. A. is not authorized to grant loans.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am speaking of the P. W. A. and the W. P. A. both. Whenever money is turned over to local communities the personnel of the employees is selected by the local authorities, just as if they had gone to the bank and borrowed the money and had complete control of the construction of the work. If it is a street, the control is in the city engineer; or if it is a sewer, the sewer department has charge; or if a highway, the county or the highway officers determine those to be employed to do the actual work on the project, subject, of course, to supervision by somebody who represents the Government to see that the money is well expended. That is the way it has been handled in Kentucky, but even that has given a good deal of dissatisfaction. However, I do not know any way to correct it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, of course, there is no perfect way to administer such a comprehensive program, but I may say to the Senator that if the rule he has announced as having been enforced in Kentucky had been enforced in Georgia the conditions of which I have complained would not have existed. I have indicated that in cases where loans and grants are made, of course such loans are turned over to the applicant, and the only supervision the Government has is to send an inspecting engineer to see that the contractor complies with the standard building practices. I know, however, that in the case of the Works Progress Administration the funds have never been turned over to the community. The project is supervised from beginning to end by a Federal agency, and not only does supervision extend to the expenditure of Federal funds but the contributions made by the local sponsors also flow into the general fund and are supervised by Federal agencies.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have been very much disappointed, I may say to the Senator, in realizing that my colleague and I have been unable to accomplish anything to relieve the complaints made in Kentucky; but it appears that we have accomplished much more than has been accomplished in Georgia, because under the W. P. A.—I am speaking of the W. P. A.—the sponsor of the project employs everyone on the project except perhaps an inspector. I have had complaints pointing out that 50 or 60, I might say, Republicans were employed—that is what is always stated—working on a particular project; and when I have called attention to it I have been advised that the Works Progress Administration had but one inspector and all the other workers were employed by the local authorities sponsoring the project. That has been true, I think.

Mr. RUSSELL. I congratulate the Senator from Kentucky and his colleague on having such a healthy condition of affairs in their State.

Mr. BARKLEY. I may add that in such cases, of course, they have to take employees from the relief rolls who are certified by some local authority who is acquainted with the relief situation, and it may be that in counties where some local authority desires to use his influence he may decide by selection which relief employees shall go on the job. Though I should like to correct that situation, I do not know how we can do it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I may say, Mr. President, that the instance cited by the Senator from Kentucky is the most powerful argument that could be made in behalf of this amendment. Here we have this organization handling funds of unparalleled size in every State of the Union without even a uniform policy required in the several States as to methods by which the funds shall be expended.

This amendment is indeed being offered to a deficiency bill, but I have already pointed out that, unless it is offered to the deficiency bill, no restriction can be placed on the expenditure of these funds, because such appropriations as this are always provided in deficiency bills. There is no enabling act prescribing rules and regulations for the Works Progress Administration. This entire gigantic system, stretching into every corner of the Nation, like Topsy, has just "growed up" in accordance with administrative rules and regulations promulgated in Washington. The Congress was dealing with a wholly new problem, and did not lay down any definite rules as to the expenditure of these funds in every State of the Union. Since we can look back at this expenditure in retrospect and see the errors that have been made here and there, I say that it is the duty of Congress to look into this situation and to prescribe rules and regulations for the expenditure of these huge sums of money.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, a moment ago, probably due to the awkward language which I used in attempting to state my purpose on the floor, an amendment which I offered was rejected. I should like now to suggest an alternative amendment, which I shall submit for the consideration of the Senator from Georgia. On page 6, at the end of the proviso, I suggest the addition of the following language:

Provided, however, That this proviso shall not be construed to apply to the employment of persons whose actual headquarters are at Washington and whose duties may take them temporarily into the several States.

Mr. RUSSELL. By no stretch of the imagination could the amendment as it now stands apply to any case where the employee had headquarters in the District of Columbia. However, I assume, inasmuch as the amendment is to be adopted, that perhaps this matter will be in some detail considered by the committee of conference, and I therefore have no objection to the Senator's proposal, though I think it is wholly unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Georgia to accept the amendment to the amendment. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF CHILD LABOR

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to recall to the attention of the Senate and the country the fact that since the present Congress has met two more States, Kentucky and Nevada, have ratified the proposed child-labor amendment to the Constitution. If 10 more State legislatures take similar action, the child-labor amendment will become a part of the Constitution.

I hope such action will be taken. I hope that my own State of Kansas will be among those which will ratify the child-labor amendment. Governor Huxman, I am glad to note, has urged the Kansas Legislature to take such action. Governor Huxman is a Democrat. His immediate predecessor in the Governor's chair, the Honorable Alf M. Landon, also urged the ratification of the child-labor amendment while he was Governor.

The people of the United States are almost unanimously opposed to the employment of children in industry. Only a few manufacturers who are so greedy for profits that they care not how much suffering such profits cost others desire to employ children because their labor is cheap, and also because employing them at low wages enables employers to hammer down the wage levels all along the line.

One might ask, How is it, then, that we still have child labor in this Nation?

The answer is that under a series of Supreme Court opinions only the States have power to legislate in this field.

Just so long as this status exists, we will have child labor in a number of States. State legislatures, except where labor is unusually strong, fear to prohibit child labor effectively, because if they make the age limits high, other States will leave them low, and give to employers the competitive advantage of cheaper labor.

The only answer, as I see it, is to empower the Congress to regulate the employment of children. That would simply mean that below 18 years of age, employment of children in industry would be under the same conditions throughout the country. One State, for instance, could not give its employers the advantage of employing 12-year-old children, thereby producing goods more cheaply than the employers of other States.

States fear to raise the age limits in their own acts regulating employment of children, because other States might profit by the competitive advantage of using cheap boy and girl labor. As a result, today in what we call this civilized Nation, 12 States permit children under 14 to be employed during school hours in nonagricultural and nondomestic occupations, and 8 States permit children under 14 to work in factories.

State regulations of dangerous occupations, so far as children are concerned, are inadequate. My information is that 11 States permit children under 16 to be employed in dangerous occupations, and 32 States have no laws protecting children 16 and 17 years of age from hazardous jobs in industry.

I am sorry to say that the records indicate an increase in the employment of children in industry last year. A compilation by the National Child Labor Committee of reports from 10 States, 98 cities, and the District of Columbia showed that in the first 5 months of 1936 work permits for 8,400 children 14 and 15 years of age were issued, compared to 3,350 such permits in the same States and cities and the District in the same months of 1935.

The committee's investigations show that a good many of these children are being exploited. It was a distinct shock to me to learn that last year, in the United States, children 8, 9, and 10 to 12 years of age were working long hours at hard labor.

I say the use of children in competitive industrial warfare because of profit from their labor, is utterly inexcusable while millions of adults are unemployed. Consider also that under constantly changing industrial conditions it is more than ever necessary that children obtain a good education.

The opposition to child labor usually is inspired by reactionary employers and their henchmen. They are supported by many, who in good faith, fear encroachments upon States' rights, but who do not have full information on the dangers of child labor.

Nothing could be further from the truth than the statements made by those who wish to continue to exploit children in industry that the amendment is aimed at the work children do on the farm and in the home. Ratification of the amendment would in no way affect the work children do for their parents.

I believe I am justified in saying that the great majority of the people of the United States are not only opposed to child labor but also are in favor of the constitutional amendment empowering Congress to regulate employment of children.

A recent poll by the American Institute of Public Opinion showed its cross section of citizens in 48 States recording a clear majority for the amendment in 45 of the States.

Mr. President, I have already pointed out that the two most recent Governors of Kansas, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, have urged the Kansas Legislature to ratify the amendment. I may add that Federal regulation of child labor has been approved by Presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, Calvin Coolidge, and Franklin D. Roosevelt; that Presidents Taft and Hoover also are on record in favor of the abolition of child labor in industry.

I have introduced a bill to apply the principles of the Hawes-Cooper and Ashurst-Sumners Convict Labor Acts to strengthen the regulation of child labor by the States, but, as I said when I introduced that measure, I do not believe such legislation can fully meet the situation. The real answer is in ratification of the child-labor amendment, and such proposed legislation as I have just mentioned is only a stopgap until Congress is empowered to meet the situation on a national scale.

I ask unanimous consent that a partial list of organizations supporting the child-labor amendment be included as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, after line 6, to insert:

CHARLES CARROLL OF CARROLLTON BICENTENARY COMMISSION

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the performance of the duties of the Charles Carroll of Carrollton Bicentenary Commission in carrying into effect the provisions of Public Resolution No. 106, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 15, 1936, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, and subsistence at not to exceed $5 per day; erection of markers and memorials; postage, printing and binding, services, office supplies and equipment; pageantry, cartographic maps and publications and their distribution, promotion and stimulation of school activities through and by means of essay and public-speaking contests and by other methods, cooperation with the State of Maryland and patriotic societies; fiscal year 1937, and to remain available until expended, $12,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 8, to insert:

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

Crop production and harvesting loans: To enable the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration to carry into effect the provisions of the Act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1937, and for other purposes", approved January 29, 1937, including personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; traveling expenses; paper, printing, and binding; supplies and services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) when the aggregate involved does not exceed $50, and such other expenses as may be necessary, fiscal year 1937, to remain available until June 30, 1938, $50,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] a few questions. After this bill came to Congress, including within it $58,000,000 for rehabilitation loans through the Resettlement Administration, Congress authorized the additional $50,000,000 for crop seed loans. It is my understanding that the $58,000,000 of rehabilitation and resettlement loans were largely seed loans last year. I desire to know if the $58,000,000 for rehabilitation and resettlement loans is necessary if the $50,000,000 is added directly for seed loans.

Mr. ADAMS. Where does the Senator get his figure of $58,000,000, so that I may have that clearly in mind?

Mr. VANDENBERG. From the debates in the House and a statement made by the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ADAMS. This is not particularly answering the Senator's question, but we feel obligated to include this item because of the direction of Congress. Congress authorized the appropriation, so the discussion of the Senator, I think, should be directed perhaps not to this section but to the appropriation for the Resettlement Administration which is included in the lump sum.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is entirely correct about that. It occurred to me perhaps he could enlighten me at this particular point on the whole subject. If the inquiry should wait, very well.

While I have the Senator's attention, may I ask if I am to understand that the total deficiency appropriation in the bill is presumed to cover the total relief deficiency for this fiscal year except such new expenditures as may be involved in flood relief and kindred emergencies?

Mr. ADAMS. That is my understanding.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Can the Senator tell me where and how the Reconstruction Finance Corporation gets back the $1,500,000,000 which it has given to relief agencies as described by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] last week? Can the Senator tell me the status of that $1,500,000,000? According to the junior Senator from Virginia it must be canceled as a Reconstruction Finance Corporation asset, or must it be appropriated for by Congress?

Mr. ADAMS. Giving only my personal judgment, I do not think the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to get it back.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, would it be fair to say, as the Senator understands the situation, that the relief deficit today, instead of being $700,000,000 or $800,000,000, is more than $2,000,000,000, and that if we were undertaking to pay the whole deficit we would have to appropriate $2,000,000,000 instead of $700,000,000 or $800,000,000?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not understand we are appropriating money to pay a deficit. My understanding is that this appropriation bill is to provide additional funds to meet conditions from now until June 30, 1937.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well. I shall use the word "deficiency" instead of "deficit." If we were going to balance the entire relief books at the end of the present fiscal year, would we need another $1,500,000,000 relief appropriation?

Mr. ADAMS. In the sense the Senator is using the term we would have to levy taxes to produce the money. Appropriations do not produce money so we would not balance the books by increasing the appropriation. We would do the reverse. If we want to balance the books we have to levy more taxes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator understands what I am trying to establish. The Senator stated it to be his understanding that this $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 appropriation would completely balance the relief account for this fiscal year.

Mr. ADAMS. If I said that, it was an error. It is my understanding that the appropriation here planned is to provide the necessary funds for relief during the remainder of this fiscal year. I did not say anything about balancing accounts.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator knows what I am trying to find out, and I think perhaps he is a little reluctant to concede my interpretation. Let me put it this way: Is it not a fact that if we were to balance our relief books at the end of this fiscal year it would require, in addition to the $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 appropriation here carried, an additional deficiency appropriation of $1,500,000,000 or more to cover the unpaid advances made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to relief?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not believe the Senator and I are using the term "balance the books" with quite the same meaning.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator use his own terms and let me know if there is not another $1,500,000,000 that has to be produced by taxation or written off the books of the Treasury in order to complete the relief account?

Mr. ADAMS. I think I understand the point the Senator is making. There is being carried as an asset upon the Government books or the books of some branch of the Government, say the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, an amount of money advanced by the R. F. C. Of course, that is not a collectible item. It is not an item which can be sold in the market. It either must be written off the R. F. C. books or must be repaid through some tax agency or tax-providing measure which will put money in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and it would leave an obligation perhaps somewhere else equal in amount.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator and I are in complete agreement on arithmetic. My terms are a bit more indicting; that is all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask for my own information by what authority the R. F. C. advanced $1,400,000,000 for relief?

Mr. ADAMS. By direction of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. KING. In what measure? Did we not make the appropriations for the R. F. C. and other relief agencies so there would be no necessity of resorting to the R. F. C. for credit or for funds?

Mr. ADAMS. As a matter of fact, the Congress saw fit to direct the R. F. C. to turn over certain funds. We could have done it another way, but that is the way in which it was done. The R. F. C. has congressional action supporting these items.

Mr. KING. Then, instead of openly and frankly making an appropriation for relief covering this $1,400,000,000, we authorized the expenditure or rather the loan of $1,400,000,000 to these agencies. These agencies of course have no funds and the $1,400,000,000 may not be repaid unless Congress makes an appropriation, and that will involve of course taxing the people or issuing more bonds.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator knows that we only ultimately pay our debts by levying taxes. It does not make any difference how we keep our books.

Mr. KING. We are paying some debts now by the issuance of bonds.

Mr. ADAMS. No; we are not paying debts by issuing bonds.

Mr. KING. We are creating obligations.

Mr. ADAMS. We may be canceling one obligation by issuing another. I know in my own State, into the bank came an old-time borrower who gave a new note in lieu of the note then held by the bank. Tearing up the old note he said, "Thank God, that is paid!" [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. On page 8 is a $50,000,000 aprpopriation pursuant to a bill which we passed at this session of Congress?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes. It was passed last week.

Mr. KING. How will that fund be administered?

Mr. ADAMS. By the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. KING. Under the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. ADAMS. Of course, the Farm Credit Administration operates under the Department of Agriculture, I understand, although it is separate to a certain extent. There is a double control of the Farm Credit Administration. The borrowers have some stock in some of its agencies. It is partly privately owned and partly publicly owned.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator advise the Senate the number of Federal agencies which are now in existence for the purpose of extending credit and loans to agriculture?

Mr. ADAMS. I regret I am not able to give the Senator that information.

Mr. KING. The committee did not find time nor did it believe it within its jurisdiction to concentrate these various activities?

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand, we have a committee which will study these matters and bring in a well-coordinated bill which will accomplish that object.

Mr. KING. I sincerely hope that understanding of the Senator will be realized.

Mr. ADAMS. We appropriate money in this bill for the benefit of that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Post Office Department—Out of the Postal revenues—Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General", on page 14, after line 3, to strike out:

Contract Air Mail Service: For an additional amount for the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, and so forth, including the same objects specified under this head in the Post Office Department Appropriation Acts for the following fiscal years, respectively:
For 1936, $100,000;
For 1937, $984,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Contract Air Mail Service: For an additional amount for the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, including the same objects specified under this head in the Post Office Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937, $734,000.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill with regard to the items eliminated by this amendment. My understanding is that the item of $100,000 in line 9, for the year 1936, applied to certain increases of rates allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to certain air-mail contractors on services rendered prior to the decision. In other words, this covers a retroactive payment. Is that correct?

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is there not a good deal of doubt as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission had the right to make any order retroactively affecting the pay of air-mail carriers?

Mr. ADAMS. The record before the committee shows that the Solicitor for the Post Office Department took the position that the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have the authority to make the award. We were confronted with two legal opinions, and we thought discretion was the better part of valor, and that we had better keep out $100,000 until the dispute is settled.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. With respect to the item in line 10, for 1937, it is my understanding that that factor does not enter.

Mr. ADAMS. That is an entirely separate matter from the $100,000 item.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is separate and distinct?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the numerals "$734,000", in line 15, and to substitute in lieu therefor "$984,000", which is the amount approved by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, line 15, in the committee amendment it is proposed to strike out "$734,000" and insert "$984,000", so as to read:

Contract Air Mail Service: For an additional amount for the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, including the same objects specified under this head in the Post Office Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937, $984,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what, if any, part of this item is due to the payment of damages for the cancelation of air-mail contracts?

Mr. ADAMS. None of it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator know from what fund such damages were paid?

Mr. ADAMS. I suppose from the Post Office appropriations.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to ask the Senator if he can give me any information concerning the amount of this appropriation the United States Government might recover in the form of revenue from the sale of air mail stamps?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly the point I was about to develop.

Mr. BONE. My interest arises only from a desire to determine whether or not there is any part of this sum which might be actually denominated a subsidy, or be of the actual character of a subsidy, or whether it is merely to take care of what we regard as a normal and legitimate expense in connection with the handling of air mail.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The fact which I think should be called to the attention of the Senate is that during the past year the amount of air mail has been tremendously increasing, and the revenues derived by the Post Office Department as the result of carrying air mail have increased during the past year by $3,000,000.

When the air mail appropriation was before Congress at the last session there was some dispute as to how much money was necessary and how much money should be made available for carrying the mail. The Post Office Department made a request of the Bureau of the Budget for some $13,000,000, as I recall, and that amount was finally reduced. But in the report which was submitted by the Committee on Appropriations to the other House on February 5, 1936, on page 21, I find this language:

The committee in making the reduction of $250,000 in the Budget estimate has not done so with a view to curtailment of service. With the increase in poundage carried and the development of passenger and express business by air, the financial condition of the mail contracors is improving and some of them should soon reach the point where the Government subsidy can be decreased. Under the law it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission periodically to examine into the financial affairs of the companies and fix the rates. An appropriation for that purpose is carried in the independent offices appropriation act. It is the confident belief of the committee that the action of the Commission in carrying out this duty will be such, based upon the improvement in the condition of the companies, as to make reductions in some of the rates and effect at least this saving.

From that language it is clear that it was the belief, at the time the original appropriation was passed, that there would be a reduction of rates and that there would be a saving. The contrary has been the fact. The Interstate Commerce Commission, whether rightly or wrongly, has increased the rates, not only under the old contracts, not only on mail that was carried prior to the time the petitions were filed, but also the Interstate Commerce Commission has undertaken to modify the rates made in the contracts, and that, I assume, was done under the provisions of section 5 of the act of Congress approved August 14, 1935, which modified section 6a of the original Air Mail Act. So we find the Post Office Department confronted with the situation that the poundage to be carried on air-mail lines is tremendously increasing and the revenue derived by the Department is tremendously increasing. There is an increase of $3,000,000 this year.

If the proposed cut of $250,000 is made effective, it will become necessary for the Post Office Department to curtail service, and it seems to me that if there is one item upon which the Senate should not require a reduction of expenditure, it is an item which is bringing into the Government revenues amounting to several times the appropriation.

I therefore hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will accept the amendment which I offer restoring for 1937 the amount contained in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement. No doubt the Senator from Tennessee and I were rising to say the same thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest that the Senator speak first.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in reference to this reduction. It involves a question of principle so far as the Senate is concerned, the question as to whether or not we shall ratify and approve a defiance of the Congress of the United States. That is what is involved in this particular reduction.

When the post-office appropriation bill came up a year ago the post-office officials asked for $12,250,000 for carrying the air mail. Congress gave them $12,000,000, and cut off $250,000. When the deficiency bill came on later in the year those officials came back and asked to have the $250,000 put back in the bill. Congress again declined to add the $250,000.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Congress has twice said, "You shall have $12,000,000 to operate the air mail", the officials have proceeded to allocate their expenses upon the basis of $12,250,000, and they justify that by the fact that a report in the House of Representatives stated that, notwithstanding they were cutting the appropriation $250,000, they did not expect the service to be lessened. So that the officials in the Post Office Department saw fit to follow their own inclination, on the expressed wish of a committee only, as overruling the definite will of Congress.

Having $12,000,000, which they should have cut into 12 parts, month by month, they have gone on and divided their money and kept up their service on the basis of an appropriation which they did not have, and which had been specifically denied them. So, as I have said, it is not merely a question of growth of the air mail, it is not a question of the poundage that is coming, it is not a question of revenue, but whether or not a Department created by Congress is to be permitted to override and defy Congress, and whether or not Congress is to submit to such defiance.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to make a statement, but perhaps it would be better to wait until the Senator from Wyoming has spoken.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I merely desire to ask the Senator from Colorado, if I may, whether he contends that no weight whatever should have been given by the Post Office Department to the expressed declaration in the report of the House committee, that the cut was being made on the assumption that it would not involve a curtailment of service, qualified by the statement which immediately follows in the report, from which I have just read, namely, that it was to be expected that the rates would be reduced by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore that in the appropriation the Department would have enough money to carry out the service then existing.

Does not the Senator believe that the Post Office Department was justified, under that language, in saying, "We will maintain the service now existing; we will not cut the service until it becomes necessary"?

The fiscal year 1937 has not yet ended, and if the amount of money asked for is not allowed, of course the Department will cut the expenditures. Five months of the fiscal year remain, and it is easy for the Department within this year to cut off $250,000, but to do so will require curtailment of service.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to point out to the Senator from Wyoming that it was stated in the hearings before the subcommittee that the Department had absolutely no intention of creating a deficiency; that this matter was being submitted to Congress for Congress to determine whether or not this service should be curtailed; that the reason for not curtailing the service on a proportionate basis over the 12 months was that the Department paid only for such trips as were made by the planes; that there was a possibility in case of a severe winter the planes would not go from the ground, and they would have enough to maintain the service under the funds appropriated, and therefore they had waited until this hour to commence the curtailment, not in defiance of Congress, but in an endeavor to carry out the expressed wishes of the Congress.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator. I think every Senator present on the floor knows that during the past year there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of mail carried not only in the air but on railroad trains. The capacity of the post offices of the country has been taxed to the utmost, and revenues have increased, I am told, between 10 and 20 percent. The demand of the people for postal service has been steadily increasing. The Department was justified, it seems to me, in waiting before curtailing the service to discover what the results would be.

Now it is for Congress to say whether or not curtailment shall be made, and it is perfectly clear that if the proposed cut shall be made the people throughout the country will suffer.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like at this point to read from the record the statement of Mr. Branch, of the Post Office Department, which appears on page 377 of the House hearings. He said:

> As I explained to you last year, when I found I was going to run a deficit, after my appropriations were allowed, then I came around to the deficiency committee and tried to get some relief. I was ruled out on that, and then I was faced with a decision as to whether I would begin a curtailment which I knew was coming on July 1, 1936, whether I would make the curtailment at that time, or wait, in the expectation that this Congress would give us a deficit and we would not have to make a curtailment.
> Before reaching a decision I talked to some of you gentlemen. I got from you, I thought, the assurance that if I had any more cost and if we came up with a real deficit, that the Bureau of the Budget recognized and sent in an estimate for, that I would not have to curtail. I have gone up to this time on that program.
> But a couple of months ago I got a notice from the Bureau of the Budget in which they called attention to the appropriation and how we were exceeding the monthly allotment, and cautioned me that I must stay within my appropriation.
> We then made an estimate and we figured that we could go on as we were until the 1st of March if we did not get this deficiency, and that we would be compelled in the last 3 months to make a sufficient curtailment of the existing service to absorb the deficit.
> So I wrote a letter to each contractor and put them on notice. I notified them that if we did not have this deficiency that we would have to curtail, and that we would do it on a fair ratio, taking into consideration the necessary services. That is the status we are in today.
> If we get a deficiency appropriation we can go along with what we have had all the year, but with no additional new services.

That is, it was a deliberate recognition of the fact that curtailments would have to come, and at that time a year ago Mr. Branch said, "If you do not give us the $250,000, we will have to curtail." So, I think, Mr. President, with all respect to my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], it is an effort to defy the Congress and to put us into the position where we must make an appropriation because they have defied the law as well as Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I interrupt the Senator from Tennessee at this time because it seems to me that this is the proper place to put into the RECORD a part of the proceedings before the Senate committee relating to the subject which has just been discussed. This occurs in the hearings before the Senate committee, at the bottom of page 153:

Senator McKELLAR. But you were proceeding, as I understand your testimony, on exactly the same theory as if you had actually gotten the $12,250,000. You have not made any curtailments or any provisions on the basis of having the $12,000,000 instead of the $12,250,000?

Mr. COLE. Up to the present time we have not; but we still have plenty of time left to stay within the $12,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for calling attention to that matter.

I happen to be the chairman of the committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and if there was any way in the world that I could properly defend a request made by the Post Office Department I certainly would do so and present it to the Senate to the best of my ability. However, I think the requests now under consideration are indefensible. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] well said just a few moments ago that last year the budget estimate for air mail was $12,250,000. The House and Senate cut that down to $12,000,000, and the President approved that action. The $250,000 was not appropriated.

Those in charge of the particular branch of the Post Office Department dealing with air mail disregarded the fact that that amount of money was left out, and as one gentleman very frankly testified, he expected to get it in a deficiency bill, and they went ahead just as if the Congress had appropriated the $12,250,000. When the deficiency bill came up last year this same official of the Post Office Department came forward and asked for a deficiency appropriation of the $250,000. After careful consideration, after arguments both in the committee and in the Senate, the Congress disallowed the item of $250,000. Certainly when the item was disallowed the second time it might have been notice to the Department that the Congress intended to stand on the $12,000,000 it had appropriated. But that did not do. The other day when the first deficiency bill of this year came up the same official of the Government came forward and asked for the same amount of $250,000, and he says now that the service will be curtailed if that amount is not granted.

Mr. President, I do not think that that willful defiance of the Congress ought to be permitted. I do not believe the Service will be injured one iota if this $250,000 is not allowed or if the $100,000 is not allowed. The two items might be considered together because, in effect as to both of them, the same disregard of the wishes of the Congress is shown.

The $100,000 item, let me say, is a deficiency of this kind: The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rates on air mail. With respect to three companies they not only fixed the rates but they antedated them. The Commissioners awarded what they called back pay, which they were never authorized to do, and which the Solicitor of the Department held they had no legal right to do. However, they absolutely disregarded the judgment of the Solicitor of the Department. They paid no attention to the Solicitor's opinion, and paid out $150,000 which might well have been used for keeping up the Service. It was paid out on those contracts, and when asked why they did not pay it all, they said they did not have any more money to pay out, that was all they had. And now here is a deficiency of $150,000 representing the difference between that sum and $250,000.

Mr. President, I do not think such action on the part of the head of a bureau ought to be countenanced by the Senate. I am strongly for air-mail service; I believe we ought to encourage it wherever we can; that we ought to build it up; that we ought to help the Department do so in every way we can; but we ought not to justify a willful disregard of the powers of the Congress and the acts of the Congress, and for that reason, though I am intensely interested in the Department, I cannot vote to increase the amount in question. I think the Senate committee acted rightly in striking out the $100,000 and in cutting down the $984,000, and I hope that the Senate will agree to those committee amendments. They are proper and should be agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I had not completed my remarks. We are faced with a very practical condition which involves very much more than the mere question of whether or not a Government department has kept within its appropriation. The question now propounded to us is whether the Air Mail Service shall be permitted to continue to grow.

I have here a statement of the total miles flown by air-mail contractors during the years 1931 to 1936. The Senate will be interested to realize that in 1931 the total air mileage was 21,381,000. It increased in 1932 to thirty-two-million-and-odd. In 1933 it increased to 35,900,000. In 1934 it decreased to 29,100,000. In 1935 it increased to 31,000,000. In 1936 it increased to 38,699,000.

Mr. President, that means only one thing. It means that the business interests of the United States, the people of the United States who use the air mail, are placing every day, every week, every month an additional burden upon the Air Mail Service of the United States. Are we then at this moment to say to the Department, with 5 months still to go, "We shall cut this appropriation down, although your revenues are increasing"?

For example, on page 161 of the Senate hearings we find an interesting table, no. 216, which shows the growth of the air-mail postage revenue. In 1933 air-mail postage revenue amounted to $6,116,000. In 1934 it dropped off to $5,700,000. In 1935 it increased to $6,589,000. In 1936 it increased to $9,702,000, an increase of $3,000,000.

What we are now saying to the Post Office Department and to the country by this amendment is simply this: "The service by air mail is going to be cut regardless of the demand." The Post Office Department has plenty of time in which to carry out the instructions of Congress. My contention here is that it is absolutely unwise to give any such instructions.

Mr. President, without burdening the Senate further with this discussion, I send to the desk a letter which was written to me at my request this morning by the Second Assistant Postmaster General, together with one sheet containing certain data, and I ask that it may be read at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter and the accompanying data will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 1, 1937.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: In compliance with your request I am submitting below brief reasons as to why the full amount of the deficiency appropriation requested by the Department for 1937 should be approved. If the estimate of the Department in the amount of $984,000, which was approved by the Budget and the House committee, is reduced, Air Mail Service will have to be reduced in proportion to any reduction made by the Senate. The estimate is not made for the purpose of putting on any new service but simply for maintaining the service which is now in effect and which is being utilized by the public as has never been done before.

During the first 5 months of this fiscal year more air mail was transported than in the entire fiscal years 1933 and 1934. The Post Office Department has conducted an intensive campaign to develop patronage of the Air Mail Service which will put it on a self-sustaining basis. As a result of that campaign last year the revenue increased over $3,000,000 despite the fact that revenue had been practically stationary during the previous 5 years of the existence of contract air-mail service. If service is now curtailed, we face the loss of patronage which has been developed by this campaign and the fact that we have been able to offer the public good air-mail service with sufficient frequency to give it a material advantage over ordinary mail.

No increase in the contractual cost of the service has occurred during the present fiscal year. There has been an increase due to the increase in poundage, for which we had to make excess payments as provided for by law. There has been a slight increase on account of additional mileage payments in cases where the Bureau of Air Commerce has prescribed slightly longer route mileage in order that the contractor would fly a safer course. There has also been some increase because contractors have completed a higher number of scheduled trips than in past years.

It would be deplorable for the Department to have to curtail air-mail service at this time when we are encouraging a campaign to develop patronage to the fullest extent. The attached statistics show the increase both in poundage and in revenue. Last year the revenue was $9,702,676.46. It is estimated that the revenue for 1937 will be $12,000,000 if we do not have to curtail service.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I shall interrupt the clerk at this point. Observe what the letter says—that the revenue in the next succeeding year will be $12,000,000, another increase of $3,000,000, and we are talking about cutting out an appropriation of $250,000 which will bring in that increase.

If it is necessary to curtail service, we will not only lose revenue and patronage during the current fiscal year but it will hurt patronage and revenue for the fiscal year 1938, in which we had expected to get revenues of $13,250,000.

Sincerely yours,

HARLLEE BRANCH,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I now ask that there be incorporated in the RECORD at this point, together with the letter which has just been read, another table which I have obtained from the Post Office Department showing the increase in the poundage carried. I shall not read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

1937 over 1934	142.43

Mr. O'MAHONEY. This table shows that in January last year, a single month, there were carried 1,177,000 pounds of mail. In June of this year there were carried 1,476,000 pounds of mail. In other words, month by month the amount of air mail is increasing, and the fact is that the added expense upon the Post Office Department under the law passed by the Congress fixing the rates during this year, has been $375,000. This increase could not possibly have been within the purview of any of the committees of Congress or of the Senate or of the House of Representatives at the time the original appropriation was passed, and I sincerely hope that my amendment, restoring the figures of the House bill, may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming demands a division.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have a roll call on the question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee demands the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I am advised, however, that if present he would vote as I shall vote, and I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] and vote "nay." I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. He being absent, I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] and vote "nay." I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I am advised, however, that if present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained on account of illness and that the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] is absent due to a death in her family.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained on account of important public business.

The Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] has been called to the State Department on official business. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY. My colleague [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] are absent because of illness, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 35, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. O'MAHONEY to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 14, in lines 21 and 22, to strike out "the Land Bank Commissioner certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury", so as to make the clause read:

Payments to Federal land banks on account of reductions in interest rate on mortgages: For an additional amount for payments to each Federal land bank of such amount as is equal to the amount by which interest payments on mortgages held by such bank have been reduced during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph "Twelfth" of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, to supplement the amount made available for this purpose for the fiscal year 1937 in one fund by the "First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936", $6,000,000.

The amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment passed over is on page 5, line 6, to strike out "$790,000,000" and to insert "$775,000,000", so as to read:

To continue to provide relief and work relief as authorized in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, and subject to all the provisions thereof, $775,000,000, which amount shall be added to, and proportionately increase the specified amounts of the limitations prescribed under, the appropriation made in such act: Provided, That no part of this appropriation or of the appropriation in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936 shall be used hereafter to pay the compensation of any person not taken from relief rolls, detailed, or loaned for service in connection with any investigation or inquiry undertaken by any committee of either House of Congress under special resolution thereof.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the attention of the members of the committee and of the Senate to that amendment. The amendment is a reduction of $15,000,000 in the aggregate amount appropriated in the bill for relief and work relief. There is nothing in the bill to indicate a specific purpose in the amendment. As already stated, it is a mere reduction of the aggregate amount.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I am concerned at this point because certain Senators have an amendment proposing to increase this amount, and I am wondering, as a matter of parliamentary procedure, if that amendment should not be disposed of before the Senate acts on the committee amendment. I merely raise that point now because I do not want to be barred from discussing the amendment proposed by some 12 or 13 Senators.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the committee amendment should not be agreed to, the provision would still be open to amendment, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, I suggest to the Senator from Washington that the amendment which he has in mind, and which I think I know the purpose of, would still be in order, and I should like to have settled the issue in the pending committee amendment.

Mr. BONE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator's remarks or delay action on this matter, but I do not wish to be in the unhappy position of having the amendment to which I have referred barred by some parliamentary procedure which would make it impossible to have it brought before the Senate for disposal.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no purpose of that nature in mind.

Mr. BONE. I fully realize that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Chair has indicated that if this amendment should be disagreed to, the provision would still be subject to amendment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Let me put it the other way—assume that the committee amendment should be agreed to, then would not the amendment referred to by my colleague be barred?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, Senators would be barred from offering further amendments if the committee amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. BONE. That is precisely the point I had in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may make an inquiry—I could not hear the statement of the Chair—assuming that the committee amendment should be agreed to, what then would be the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the committee amendment shall be agreed to, the matter will be disposed of and not be subject to further amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. As I stated, I did not hear the statement of the Chair. Then it would follow from the inquiry of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] that if the amendment should be agreed to he would be barred from offering the amendment which he has suggested?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as already stated, there is nothing in the bill which discloses the purpose on the part of those proposing the amendment to reduce or eliminate funds to be made available by the bill for any particular purpose. It is my understanding, however, that in the aggregate item of $790,000,000 is embraced an amount to be available for Resettlement and that the hearings disclose that the object of the amendment is to prevent the use of further funds in connection with what is known as farmstead or other similar resettlement projects.

The item carries an amount of $14,000,000 of the $15,000,000 which probably would be used in completing resettlement projects already in existence.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. That is another item in the bill, is it?

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I do not quite understand.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is difficult to state. The appropriation for relief and work relief comprehends a great many purposes, as the Senator well understands. In that item of $790,000,000 are such funds. It is expected, if the item be preserved as passed by the House of Representatives, that $14,000,000 will be used to complete resettlement projects already initiated and in process of construction. If the amendment reported by the committee is agreed to, it will make difficulty in the allotment of the funds, because, as I have already said, there is nothing in the bill to indicate the purpose of the reduction.

In theory of law a reduction might be made from funds allotted to any other purpose or to be allotted to any other purpose; but, assuming that judicial notice will be taken of the purpose in mind in eliminating the $15,000,000, the result would be the termination of the construction of projects already partly completed. On some of these projects are buildings which have been partly constructed, which have not been completed, and which will not be completed if the amendment is adopted and remains in the bill.

I have discussed the matter with the Secretary of Agriculture and with others. Even if it is the intention and the desire of the Congress to terminate programs for resettlement, it is felt that in any event the projects which have been begun should be completed; otherwise a large part of the funds which have already been expended will be lost or wasted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand the $15,000,000 which it has been proposed shall be eliminated from the bill, is intended to be used to complete projects already begun and not yet completed?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. If the amendment proposed by the committee is agreed to, the hearings show there is in contemplation a suspension of activities with regard to the resettlement projects.

I have not discussed the matter with all the authorities of the Resettlement Administration because the subject was not brought to my attention until just a few moments ago, but those with whom I have talked, including particularly the Secretary of Agriculture, recognize that very serious consideration should be given to the question of whether new projects of the character referred to and affected by the amendment should be hereafter initiated.

There are many matters in connection with the subject which the Secretary of Agriculture feels should have investigation and inquiry, but it is believed that to suspend those projects which are embraced in the list which is before me would result in loss and would make the projects ineffective to accomplish the purpose for which they were initiated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator, not being a member of the committee, may not have before him the information which I should like to obtain. I should like to know what appropriations heretofore were made for the benefit of the Resettlement organization or the organization of which it is a child, and also what disposition has been made of those appropriations and whether they have all been expended.

Mr. ROBINSON. My recollection is—and if I am in error the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill will please correct me—that appropriations have not been made for the specific purpose of constructing these projects. The projects have been initiated and proceeded with under general allotment made by the President under the authority granted by acts of Congress. In my judgment, he would still, as a matter of law, have a right to make an allotment for the Resettlement Administration for the completion of these projects notwithstanding the amendment, because the amendment does not specifically provide what work shall be discontinued or that any work shall be discontinued. In other words, the amendment may prove ineffective to accomplish the purpose of those who propose it. If the Executive should look into the hearings and find what was in the minds of those who proposed the amendment, he would have the power to refuse to make any further allotment whatever for the completion of these projects.

I do not recall or know just to what the other $1,000,000 was to be applied. The amendment would reduce the appropriation by $15,000,000. Of that amount it is expected by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Resettlement Administrator that an allotment of $14,000,000 would be made to complete the projects already in process of construction.

I am stating these facts and circumstances in order that the committee and other Members of the Senate may pass upon the question whether it is their purpose to compel the abandonment of projects already started, whether it is their purpose to force the loss of those funds which have already been applied under allotments made heretofore to the partial construction of the projects.

There is a great deal of difference in the status of some of the projects. Some of them are near completion, others are approximately half completed, still others have had less work done on them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the able Senator from Arkansas what is assumed to be the amount necessary to continue and carry on to completion the projects already in hand?

Mr. ROBINSON. The additional $14,000,000, as I have already stated, which is to be taken from the bill by the committee amendment. If the committee amendment prevails and the Executive carries out the implication of the amendment as derived from the hearings before the committee, work will stop on the projects which I have stated are already partially completed. If the $14,000,000 be kept in there will be no other projects of this nature initiated until a very careful study of the subject has been made.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I believe it would be helpful if we could have some information regarding the projects in question so as to determine whether some of them are so far completed that they ought to be finished.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have all that information here and propose to place it in the RECORD. It would require perhaps an hour to read the information in complete detail. Some of the projects, as I have already stated, are completed or approaching completion. Others have more recently been initiated and less work has been done on them. Others are halfway completed. On many of the projects are houses in process of erection or construction which will not be completed if the amendment prevails.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator state whether the $14,000,000 will entirely complete all of the projects, or is it merely this year's obligation?

Mr. ROBINSON. The $14,000,000, in addition to the amount now available, according to information supplied me, will complete the projects which are now in process of construction.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And they will require no further appropriation?

Mr. ROBINSON. No further appropriations for this class of work will be required or even recommended until a further study of how the projects are operating has been made. That is the statement made to me by the Secretary of Agriculture. I will read exactly what is said. The statement actually comes from the Resettlement Administration, but it was supplied at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I know it has his approval.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the able Senator why whoever has charge of this fund, or the organization which has charge of it, started on the construction of these projects unless it was known there were ample funds available to complete them?

Mr. ROBINSON. This is a deficiency appropriation bill to carry out in the main works which have already been initiated. It is not an authorization bill in the sense that any project is to be initiated with the funds carried in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. In just a moment. The reason for that is that certain projects have been commenced and are not completed, and this deficiency appropriation is necessary to enable their completion.

I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that as a result of the terrific drought during the last year a large amount of funds originally intended for Resettlement was diverted from Resettlement in order to take care of drought relief?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and for other pressing purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And is it not also true that these uncompleted projects cover acreage where the Government has taken an option on the land and closed the options, except insofar as paying for them is concerned, and many thousands of farmers have been left somewhat suspended, not knowing whether their projects were to be completed or whether they would be able to sell their land, or would have to go back on them?

Mr. ROBINSON. What the Senator says is undoubtedly true. It would create very great confusion and cause loss, as I have repeatedly explained.

In answer to a question that was asked me a few moments ago about whether any portion of this fund is to be used in commencing new projects, I should like to read from a memorandum to which reference has already been made:

When this matter was considered by the Senate Appropriations Committee, there developed on the part of some members of the committee a spirited opposition to appropriating any more money for projects, and it was finally decided to reduce the total amount of the deficiency appropriation by $15,000,000. It was evidently the intent of the committee that this should be taken out of the money intended for the completion of these projects. The language, however, is such as to leave this question in uncertainty, and it is likely, if left as it is, to make it embarrassing to the President when he comes to allocate these funds.

The quotation continues:

The Department of Agriculture is convinced that the projects now under construction should be completed, but that further construction should not be started until a very careful study is made of the whole program for the development of farmsteads. If this is not done, there will be over the country in these different projects partly constructed houses left standing. Not only would these unfinished buildings be an embarrassment but a delay in their completion would add greatly to their cost and result in an inevitable loss to the Government. Because of this it seemed highly desirable that the $15,000,000 recommended to be eliminated should be restored.

There were attached to the memorandum, a part of which I have read, several pages from a report on "rural and suburban resettlement program." Group 1 consists of "projects initiated by division of subsistence homesteads."

Group 2 relates to "projects initiated by Federal Emergency Relief Administration."

Group 3 relates to other Resettlement Administration projects known as the infiltration projects.

There are several other groups distinguished because of the particular purpose in mind in their initiation.

The amount required to complete all the projects which have been started is the $14,000,000, and the approximate amount necessary in each instance is stated in the memorandum, which I shall publish as a part of my remarks.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have stated, I feel that the committee should consent that the amendment be disagreed to.

I ask that the statement to which I have just referred be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. May I inquire as to who it was who signed the letter the Senator read? I make this inquiry because I was informed in the committee meeting the other day that there would be no unfinished houses, that all the projects now under construction would be completed, but that it would prevent a further extension of those projects. I should like to know who is right.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement is not signed. It was furnished me at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture. He stands sponsor for it.

Of course, the data came from the Resettlement Administration; and, I repeat, the object is to finish the projects which have been initiated, and no part of the fund will be available or used for any other purpose.

Mr. DUFFY. There is a project near Milwaukee in which I have been very much interested, and the information given seemed to be exactly opposite to that which the Senator now states.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the information given to the Senator?

Mr. DUFFY. That even with the fourteen or fifteen million dollars there was no project under Resettlement that would not be completed—that is, any houses, any construction which had been started—but that it would merely prevent a further extension of some of those projects. I took that to mean that those houses which have been started in Greendale, Wis., would all be completed.

Mr. ROBINSON. What would prevent an extension?

Mr. DUFFY. My understanding from the committee was——

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's understanding is erroneous, in my judgment. As I have been stating throughout my remarks, the effect of the amendment is to discontinue construction on the projects which are embraced in this list, and which are in various stages of completion. No further projects will be initiated until additional study has been made of the subject. But if this amendment shall prevail, the projects will not be completed; they will be abandoned.

Mr. DUFFY. The statement was that some $39,000,000 is unexpended and is still available for the purpose of completing these projects. I am merely seeking information. I should not like to see the projects in a partial state of construction. I think they ought to be completed. I think we ought to know where we stand. The information the Senator has stated seems to be contrary to what the committee has before it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will print the statement in each instance showing the number of units, the total land acres, the total land cost, the farmstead cost and other costs, total estimated cost, of all agencies and additional funds requested. The additional funds requested aggregate $14,000,000. Some of the projects perhaps will not require additional funds. I am sure some of them have been completed.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, either the Secretary of Agriculture has misinformed the Senator from Arkansas, or the Resettlement Administration misinformed the Committee on Appropriations. We had before us Mr. Alexander, who is in charge of the Resettlement Administration, and we had others of his staff before us. These are the facts as we get them from these officials of the Resettlement Administration.

In the first place, it will take not $14,000,000, but $49,000,000, to complete all of the projects which have been initiated. The Resettlement Administration today has unallocated funds amounting to $78,000,000. The Resettlement Administration today has $35,000,000 obligated to the completion of these projects. If the information which the Senator from Arkansas got was correct, they have $29,000,000 more than they need to complete the projects.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I read from the statement to the Senator?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I stated a moment ago, this subject has just come to me within the last few hours. On page 101 it is shown that Mr. Baldwin said:

> I might say, Senator ADAMS, that the amount of money which was requested, and which our regional people felt it would take to complete properly these projects, most of which were started before Resettlement was organized, was an amount greatly in excess of $14,000,000. We feel that that is the minimum figure that we can get by with.

This is a statement in the hearings, to which the Senator has referred, in answer to a question of his own, which shows that $14,000,000 is the minimum amount the Resettlement Administration felt was necessary to complete the projects.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The same witness, Mr. Baldwin, testifying as to the same appropriation, made the following statement before the House committee:

> Mr. TABER. Do you mean that this $49,000,000 is what will be required to finish the jobs you have started?
> Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir; that is right. Of that amount, approximately $35,000,000 is available from old funds.
> Mr. TABER. That $35,000,000 is included in that block of money that you have unobligated as of December 31?
> Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir; as of December 31.

The Senator from Colorado has repeated what was stated to us, that as of the first of the year they have $35,000,000 in this particular fund unobligated.

Mr. ADAMS. The statement is made, and if we may go back, Mr. President, I will say that in the 1936 Deficiency Act this provision was included:

> No Federal project shall be undertaken or prosecuted under the foregoing appropriation unless and until an amount sufficient for its completion has been allocated and irrevocably set aside for its completion.

That was in the last deficiency bill. We said to all of those participating in these funds, "You shall not initiate a project unless the money is set aside irrevocably for its completion." They have two different meanings attached to the term "completion."

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I am trying to get my mind made up about this matter. It seems to me that what the Senator from South Carolina has said fully confirms what the Senator from Arkansas stated. It requires $49,000,000 to complete these projects; they have $35,000,000 with which to do it, and if I have not forgotten my arithmetic, that leaves $14,000,000 necessary to complete the projects. That is what Mr. Baldwin said, and that is what I derive from the quotation from the evidence.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the statement made by Mr. Baldwin is that a detailed statement of the use of the unobligated balance, plus the estimates under consideration, makes a total of $158,000,000—the balance he had on hand, plus the estimates of funds he would like to get. We have reduced by $14,000,000 this amount, which is in the deficiency bill for the remainder of this fiscal year.

They have set forth in a detailed statement what they would do with the $158,000,000, have itemized the different statements. They do say, "Rural resettlement and subsistence projects, $49,000,000."

Out of the $158,000,000, if they are given the entire amount asked for, and have this balance, they would use $49,000,000. It does not mean that a house under construction will not be completed, because they have $35,000,000. It goes to the extension of the projects; and I do not care to go into that, because I believe the Senator from Colorado intends to do so, and I prefer that he explain what is meant by finishing the projects.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not believe the Senator from Kentucky has the mathematics correctly in mind. The Resettlement Administration has $35,000,000 now irrevocably available to them to apply to these projects. They say that it will take, in addition to the $35,000,000, $14,000,000 to complete the projects in the form in which they were designed. The $35,000,000 will complete every house which is now under construction.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Colorado might add that it would do much more than that.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; it would do much more than that. The officials stated in the hearings before the House committee that they could not use the $35,000,000 during this fiscal year. They said they could not use that amount. Mr. Baldwin, speaking of this subject, said:

> All of that will not be expended because the money is irrevocably allocated. It means that we have no flexibility.

Then, reading from page 262, I find he said:

> So there will be a substantial balance of the $35,000,000 which will remain unexpended on June 30.

What the Resettlement Administration wants is just what every other department which has ever been before an appropriation committee seeks. They have available $35,000,000. They have more than they can possibly use during the remainder of this fiscal year, but they are reaching out for an additional and an unneeded appropriation to have in their hands.

The Senator from Arkansas is in error when he says that if they do not get the $14,000,000 these projects will be abandoned. Not a single project, if I understand the situation correctly, will be abandoned. The work upon every house that is under process of completion in the whole period of time between now and the 30th of June will be pushed as much as possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to inquire if the Senator does not understand the evidence as I do, that the $35,000,000 is ample to complete every project, as the law requires. The law, as expressed in the last deficiency bill, required a project to have an allotment and an irrevocable apportionment of the money to such project, and that has been done, so it is said. But the desire for the $14,000,000 is to put additional units in the same projects, as I understand the testimony.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has the situation clearly in mind. There are two ways in which those in charge of the work use the term "completion." They were forbidden by Congress to enter upon a project unless they had money to complete it, so they laid out a series of resettlement areas. They did not have the money to complete all of their plans but they would say, "Here is a unit, and we will complete half of that unit, and then we will get money for the other half." They say to us, "We need the additional money to go ahead and initiate other structures upon these units." That is, they are thinking of the completion of their general plan. But they said when they got the $35,000,000 and started the work that that amount would complete the project. That is, they completed it in one sense, after getting the $35,000,000, but they have another method of completing it when asking for the $14,000,000.

I want to see this project carried out. Like the Senator from Wisconsin, I am interested in projects in my own State. But I think that in a deficiency bill—and that is what we are dealing with here—we ought not to make appropriations which are not needed within the current fiscal year, and which merely provide funds for the continuation of projects or the starting of new projects in a given fiscal year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Just to emphasize the point which the chairman of the subcommittee made, that there are two meanings to "completion", I desire to read from page 262 of the House hearings:

> Mr. TABER. I thought you told me that this allocation was irrevocable and that it had to be enough to complete the project.
> Mr. BALDWIN. It has to be enough to complete a certain number of units in the project.
> Mr. TABER. This $17,000,000 that you are asking for here—

They asked for $17,000,000 and the House allowed $14,000,000—> is for you to go ahead with new projects and not for old projects?

> Mr. BALDWIN. New units of old projects which are required and which will be necessary to make the projects successful.

In other words, they have on hand irrevocably allocated to these projects enough to complete entirely the units of the projects for which the Congress appropriated the money; that is, the $85,000,000 we gave them at the last session of Congress. The $14,000,000 requested will permit the construction of new units to existing projects.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to point out to the Senator from Colorado that another difficulty involved in this type of appropriation is that the projects themselves are so ephermeral that it is often impossible for anyone, even in good faith, to approximate what the ultimate cost is to be. Here is a resettlement project which does not happen to be under the Resettlement Administration, but is under Mr. Hopkins and the W. P. A. Nevertheless, it is included within this bill, and it demonstrates the infirmity which necessarily attaches to this sort of an undertaking.

I am now referring to the Matanuska project. I call the Senate's attention to the fact that on June 24, 1935, Mr.

Hopkins said that the cost of Matanuska was estimated at $1,093,000. That was in perfectly good faith, precisely as was the letter read by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. By December 27, 1935, 6 months later, Mr. Hopkins reported that Matanuska had cost $2,325,000. It had doubled in cost in 6 months. Meanwhile he said at that time it would take only $100,000 more to complete the project, but on January 14, 1937, he writes me that he has now spent on Matanuska $3,975,000, and that he needs $800,000 more to complete it. In other words, the $1,000,000 project has just naturally flowered into a $5,000,000 project, and meanwhile the beneficiaries of the $5,000,000 project, which has increased 500 percent over its original cost, are proposing to strike unless they are kept on W. P. A.

I am now submitting that the able Senator from Arkansas read that the minimum requirement for these Resettlement projects is $14,000,000. I think the word "minimum" is the most important word in the entire communication he read. It is the minimum, and Heaven only knows what the maximum is, unless a stop order is put in somewhere.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, with the hope of throwing a little light on this controversy, I wish to say that last Saturday evening I spent 2 hours in Mr. Alexander's office, at which time his conversation confirmed the stand that the Senator from Arkansas has taken. He said, "$15,000,000 is to be cut off our appropriation." He explained to me that that would mean stopping some of the projects in Oklahoma that had already been begun, and that it would be necessary to have that amount to complete those projects. I am not a member of the committee conducting the hearings, but believe that since we have begun these projects we ought to finish them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is difficult to understand the disparity between the figures and the statements made here. I do not look at this matter from the standpoint of my own State any more than others, but I am not devoid of those human qualities and attributes which make me interested, of course, in what happens in my State. Personally I am for the Resettlement Administration. Personally I should like to see it made a permanent part of the Government service of the United States, because I think it has rendered a valuable service and is capable of more valuable service.

When the program was started it was contemplated that there would be six projects in the State of Kentucky, and I happen to know more about that than I do about any other State, of course. They whittled it down until they got it down to one project, and now there is contained in this bill and in the list which is submitted here only one project out of the six originally contemplated. When recently I took up with the Resettlement Administration the question of completing that one project so that in my State the Government would not be in the position of having started something and not finishing it and leaving a great many people high and dry in the air, not knowing what the Government was to do about it, and thereby disappointing the faith of the people in the Government, I was met by the proposition that they did not have enough money to complete that project. I assume that they were telling me the truth about that, and for that reason it is one of the projects they propose to complete with this $14,000,000. I mention that to show that in my State they have cut down the original projects from six to one, and now have not enough money to complete that one. Certainly they ought to be allowed to complete that one out of the six.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, they will never reach the point where they will have all the money they need. I happen to occupy the unfortunate position of being chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee in charge of deficiency appropriations. The Senate seeks to impose upon the Appropriations Committee certain obligations. Among those is an effort to endeavor to conserve money and to avoid needless expenditures. The committee and this bill have to do only with appropriations to carry the Government to the 30th of June, being primarily limited to those things which have arisen by one reason or another, so that there is a deficiency, a shortage of money, not enough to carry on until then.

The Resettlement Administration has money enough, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, to carry on this program without diminution up until the 30th of June and not stop work on any of its projects. It has $35,000,000.

I have great sympathy with the dream which accompanies the resettlement. The practical working out, however, of the dream has been disappointing. Ninety-one million dollars has gone into these projects and 10,777 families are all that have been taken care of. The projects are costing an average of over $7,000. Some of them cost $14,750. You are not taking care of a fellow who is in distress when you are providing him with houses of that nature. A number of the individual projects are costing over $12,000. Many of them are costing over $10,000.

Mr. President, I say it is a marvelous dream; but the number of people we can accommodate upon that basis is relatively small. I think the Senator from Kentucky has been thinking of other phases of the work of the Resettlement Administration where they do come in touch with vast numbers of people.

The Resettlement Administration is the only agency of the Government today which is making grants. Other administrations such as the W. P. A. are employing people upon a wage basis. Others are making loans. The Resettlement Administration is actually making grants, small grants of $20 a month, to families in distress. They are touching people by the hundreds of thousands, and they are making small loans not to exceed $300 per loan. In that way $90,000,000 has been paid out. The cut here made was made with a purpose. It will not interfere with the work. It was made to indicate that the Congress did not approve of the initiation of new projects. In other words, we were confronted with a bill coming from the other House, in turn having its source with the Director of the Budget, and doubtless with the President, asking for $790,000,000—a lump sum. We find nothing in the bill itself, as the Senator from Arkansas pointed out, which defined the particular purpose. We called before us the Director of the Budget and others. We read the House hearings. We find that it is intended—a pure matter of intention—to allocate $80,000,000 for resettlement work. The Resettlement Administration had on the 1st of January $78,000,000 unobligated in their hands. So they are not in distress. They have $35,000,000 definitely obligated to particular types of housing projects. It is not a distress situation. Some members of the committee disapproved of the project generally. Some of them like myself sympathized with or approved of the general plan. But it seemed to us that we should say something indicating that we wanted the projects that were under way completed before new ones were started. So we are endeavoring to indicate our opinion in the only way we can without going into the bill, dividing it up, earmarking it by the report of the committee which we made and indicating that the $14,000,000 should come off.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Colorado if the last bill providing funds for Resettlement and for work relief and relief did not simply provide that of the total amount there should be available for Resettlement only $85,000,000?

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. BYRNES. That is for the present fiscal year. So that the effect of this bill is to give additional funds and no limitation is being placed?

Mr. ADAMS. I may say to the Senator that if the amendment shall be adopted instead of having $85,000,000, as Congress intended, they will have $143,000,000. It is an increase over what Congress meant they should have.

Mr. BYRNES. An increase from $85,000,000 to $143,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very anxious to be right about this matter.

Mr. ADAMS. May I say to the Senator from New York that those of us on the committee have also been eager to be right but we have found it difficult. The presentation of this matter to the committee has not been so clear as it might have been. That is due to the fact that there has been a change in the administration. It is not the fault of the present administration. Mr. Alexander came in comparatively a few weeks ago and took over the organization. He could not know all about it. He has been handicapped, and the result is he has handicapped us. The information for the statement I am making is the result of a most careful effort to get the facts out of the testimony before the House committee, and out of the record and the testimony before the Senate committee.

Mr. COPELAND. I was told by a Senator a few moments ago that near his home there was a Resettlement project where there were to be erected 400 houses—I think I am correct as to the number. It was cut down to 200, and they now have actually under construction and incomplete 135 houses. If I understand what the Senator from Colorado said a moment ago, they would have the money to finish the 135 houses; that is to say, that there are funds provided to take care of all the houses actually under construction today?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes. I do not mean it is specified and set out in the bill, but there is, in fact, a sum of money substantially equal to that demand.

Mr. COPELAND. In short, then, if we should appropriate $14,000,000 by this bill, it would simply enable the R. A. to begin to construct perhaps more houses to the extent of $14,000,000? Is that correct?

Mr. ADAMS. That is my understanding.

Mr. McKELLAR. New houses to the extent of $14,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that is not correct, but I will refer to it in my own time.

Mr. COPELAND. My leader says it is incorrect; the chairman says it is correct; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not know.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I think the difficulty we encounter is in obtaining accurate information on this question. If Senators will read the statement of representatives of the R. A. in the House hearings they will come to the conclusion that they have on hand sufficient funds to complete all projects that have been undertaken, and that, as a necessary inference, the $14,000,000 asked for in addition are to be used for new projects.

On page 262 of the House hearings there is a break-down of the $14,000,000 additional funds which are requested. Finally the last word, after all this contradictory and unsatisfactory testimony, was given before the House and before the Senate. Mr. Baldwin, representing the Resettlement Administration, was asked this question by Senator RUSSELL:

Senator RUSSELL. And the additional funds you are asking for are for additional units of those projects?

Mr. BALDWIN. For additional units on some of the projects; and part of this money is for work on projects which we inherited from F. E. R. A. and subsistence homesteads.

There is no break-down so far as the record shows, and, so far as I am advised, as to how much of this $14,000,000 is to be used for new units or projects and how much is to be used for completing projects that were inherited from the F. E. R. A. and the subsistence homestead.

My purpose in rising is to emphasize what the chairman of the subcommittee has, in effect, stated that the testimony upon this point was so unsatisfactory, and, if I may add, so contradictory, that the committee could not arrive at a fair and just conclusion as to what the $14,000,000 was to be used for.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. It did not seem to me that there was much confusion. We had before us the testimony of these gentlemen both before the House and Senate committees, and I quote from page 262 of the House hearings:

Mr. TABER—

That is Representative TABER, who was questioning Mr. Baldwin—

Mr. TABER. This $17,000,000 that you are asking for—

They asked for $17,000,000 in the House, instead of $14,000,000 which they asked for in the Senate—

This $17,000,000 that you are asking for here is for you to go ahead with new projects, and not for old projects?

Mr. BALDWIN. New units of old projects which are required and which will be necessary to make the projects successful.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, what is the interpretation of the word "unit" as given there by Mr. Baldwin? Does that mean a new house, simply a house? In other words, they have established a project, and the completion of that project requires, we will say, the construction of a hundred houses for families that are to be brought in from other sections of the country, especially from sections that have been taken over by the Government for other purposes, and they have only started 50 houses. Then the beginning of new units simply means the beginning of a sufficient number of new houses in order to make the projects successful and enable them to carry out the original intention with respect to it?

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky it is my understanding that a project may cover a hundred acres.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or a thousand.

Mr. ADAMS. And if they are planning 20 houses, giving each house 5 acres, each 5 acres would be termed a "unit"; so there would be 20 units in the project.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course a unit, according to the Senator's definition, includes not only the house but the land. They do not have to begin any new units so far as the land is concerned; the land is already there, but the unit, within the meaning of the testimony, would mean the beginning of a new house not already under construction? Is that correct?

Mr. ADAMS. Of course a part of the problem which the Resettlement Administration has is this: The Resettlement Administration has purchased land. They could not buy land under the deficiency act of 1936, but they could buy land under the 1935 act. So they want new money to use for general purposes, without going back and using the money available to them which they could use for the purchase of land. Their theory is that if they could get this $14,000,000 they would have to use less of the $35,000,000, which they could use to purchase land. So it is, from their standpoint, a matter of having a more desirable fund in their hands as against a less desirable fund.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where a project has been established, of course, there are two ends to it; one is the moving out of people who are within the area of the project and the moving in of others who are dispossessed somewhere else; and if the project calls for the erection of 50 houses in order to take care of the people contemplated to be moved in and only 25 houses have been begun, what is the reason why the other 25 houses ought not to be completed so as to carry out the original plan of the project and make it succeed, even if they have to start a new house where the foundation has not been laid?

Mr. ADAMS. There is no reason why they should not do so. We were confronted and they were confronted with the provision of the 1936 Deficiency Act which reads:

No Federal project shall be undertaken or prosecuted under the foregoing appropriation unless and until an amount sufficient for its completion has been allocated and irrevocably set aside for its completion.

In other words, they argued with the committee that the completion of separate houses upon what are called "units" is a completion within that term, and they argued for more money, for they said, "In order to complete the project we must be able to complete all the houses."

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I merely wish to conclude. I do not want to take too much time. I have submitted to the Senate the view of the committee that the money is not needed by the Resettlement Administration. If the understanding of the Senator from Arkansas were correct, that the failure to make the $14,000,000 would stop all these projects, I should be opposed to the amendment. After careful study of the record, after hearing the testimony, I am convinced that the denial of the $14,000,000 will not impede the proper progress of the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what disposition did Mr. Alexander, or any of those representing the organization, say they would make or intended to make of the $35,000,000 now available and in their hands?

Mr. ADAMS. They said they could not spend it all by the 30th of June next, that they will have some left after that date.

Mr. KING. Was there anything before the committee showing the amount of money expended by the Resettlement organization?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; we had very elaborate and complete tables of their work so far as the construction of these projects is concerned. So far as rehabilitation work is concerned, the information has come in from other sources and is not so complete.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask another question, but before doing so, let me state a situation. In my State, when I was home in November——

Mr. ADAMS. I might say that I asked what was the total amount of money they had, and they said $369,000,000 had been put in the hands of the Resettlement Administration up to this time.

Mr. KING. I should like to know what they have done with it.

Mr. President, I may say, in passing, before I make my suggestion, that I think there has been a great deal of waste, and that it is one of the most extravagant organizations which have ever been set up under the Government.

I should like to ask the Senator if the situation I am about to mention would come within the contemplation of the amendment involving the $14,000,000, if it should be provided. I inquired of one of their representatives in my State as to what they were doing, and he stated that they had recently purchased, or had contracted to purchase, 35 farms. I asked if they were farms upon which people were living. The reply was, "Yes." I said, "Then you are purchasing farms and moving out men and their families in order to move in others who have failed in their farming activities?" He stated that the 35 farmers whom they were moving had been successful farmers. The Government was paying $100 an acre for some of the land. I suggested then that possibly they were moving out good farmers and moving in those who had made a failure upon farms. He stated, "As to that, I do not know; but we have been authorized to purchase these 35 farms, and we intend to do so." I was wondering if the purchase of these farms would come within the $14,000,000 or of the $35,000,000, and if that is a project within the authorization or contemplation of the law of Congress?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not think that that phase of it is included.

Mr. KING. I thought not; but still it is one of the activities of the Resettlement organization.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is regrettable that more definite and accurate information has not been made available with respect to the subject matter under consideration. The debate has convinced me of the substantial correctness of the statement I made in the beginning.

It is apparent that the facts relative to the matter were not made entirely clear in the hearings either before the House committee or before the Senate committee. The point is that this fund of $14,000,000 is required if we are to complete the projects which have already been initiated and begun. The facts are that on some of the projects what are called new units will be constructed from the $14,000,000, and that units which have already been begun will be completed.

If Senators will analyze the testimony, that is the conclusion that will be reached, I think, by everyone who hears me. To illustrate: In my home State is a project which I visited very recently known as the Wright's plantation project. It is one of the projects which will require additional funds to complete. A number of houses or units have been finished and are occupied. When I saw the project there was an equal number partly completed and not ready for occupancy.

These projects are organized on a definite basis. Those who plan their organization determine where they may best be located, the number of units that shall constitute a project, and other details which pertain to the completion of the project. Here is a project that contemplates, let us say, 100 units. It will have a number of facilities when the project is completed that are intended to serve those 100 units. If we stop the project when 5 or 10 or 25 units have been completed, if we merely provide for the completion of those houses which are now partly constructed, we will have an incomplete project—not necessarily an incomplete unit of the project, but an incomplete project which the organizers of it would not expect to be able to operate with a fair measure of success. The community facilities which are planned for the project contemplate a given number of units. If we stop the construction of projects with a less number of units the plan is out of joint, and necessarily so.

Reference has been made to the House hearings. While some of the answers do not appear to be conclusively responsive to the questions asked, nevertheless I refer to pages 261 and 262 where an effort was made to explain the situation. I read under the title "Completion of Present Projects." That is the subject which was then being discussed:

COMPLETION OF PRESENT PROJECTS

Mr. TABER. What else is there that you expect to spend money on?

Mr. BALDWIN. On projects?

Mr. TABER. That is what I am trying to find out. Go ahead.

Mr. BALDWIN. There are funds required to complete our present projects.

Mr. TABER. What are those projects?

Mr. BALDWIN. They are the projects described by Dr. Alexander.

Mr. TABER. What will it cost to complete the projects?

Mr. BALDWIN. Approximately $49,000,000.

Not $14,000,000, but the answer is:

Approximately $49,000,000.

Mr. TABER. I wish you would go into that a little bit and tell us something about it.

Mr. BALDWIN. I would like to make one statement in that connection before I go into a further description of the projects, which I think Dr. Alexander can handle more adequately than I can: Under the terms of the 1936 act we have received allocations from the President in sufficient amount to complete different units of projects. Those funds are irrevocable. That means that on July 1 some of the money will remain unobligated and will be required to complete the work that has already been started.

Mr. TABER. Do you mean that this $49,000,000 is what will be required to finish the jobs you have started?

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir; that is right. Of that amount, approximately $35,000,000 is available from old funds.

Mr. TABER. That $35,000,000 is included in that block of money that you have unobligated as of December 31.

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir; as of December 31.

Mr. TABER. Is the whole $49,000,000 in there?

Mr. BALDWIN. No, sir; only $35,000,000 would be in there.

Of course, that is not very clear. The expression "in there" is somewhat indefinite.

Mr. TABER. Only $35,000,000 in this block?

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Mr. TABER. There is $35,000,000 of the $49,000,000 in that block of money that was unobligated as of December 31.

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TABER. And that has been irrevocably allocated to these particular projects.

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TABER. For the completion of those particular projects.

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TABER. You are putting in $49,000,000 as the amount you want to spend between now and the end of the year.

Mr. BALDWIN. No, sir; it is $17,000,000. All of that will not be expended because the money is irrevocably allocated. It means that we have no flexibility in the transfer of funds from one project to another. If we have $500,000 set up for one project and do not need it on that particular project between now and June 30, we cannot ask that the $500,000 be transferred to some other project.

Mr. TABER. It would simply revert to the Treasury.

Mr. BALDWIN. It may revert to the Treasury if it remains unexpended, but it will be required, because some of this construction work cannot be completed by June 30. So there will be a substantial balance of the $35,000,000 which will remain unexpended on June 30.

Mr. WOODRUM. You are using $17,000,000 on the basis of $90,000,000.

I do not know what that means.

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir; I will have to adjust those figures.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is that for new construction?

Mr. BALDWIN. There is nothing at all for construction in new projects.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is there anything for the acquisition of land?

Mr. BALDWIN. No, sir. We have not purchased any land from last year's appropriation. There was some question about whether we could legally do it. Our land was purchased under the act passed in 1935.

Mr. TABER. I thought you told me that this allocation was irrevocable and that it had to be enough to complete the project.

Mr. BALDWIN. It has to be enough to complete a certain number of units in the project.

Mr. TABER. This $17,000,000 that you are asking for here is for you to go ahead with new projects and not for old projects?

Then comes the answer read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]:

New units of all projects which are required and which will be necessary to make the projects successful.

Even that answer, by the information which I have from other sources, is not complete. It might very well have been, "new units of old projects and the completion of units already commenced." Any other statement would make false the declaration by the Secretary and the Resettlement Division that "there will be, over the country, on these different projects, partly constructed houses left standing to embarrass the administration. Not only would these unfinished buildings be an embarrassment but a delay in their completion would cause loss." That has reference to buildings already partly constructed. Delaying their completion would cause loss.

So that clearly $49,000,000 all told, of which they have $35,000,000 already, is required to complete the projects already initiated. If the $19,000,000 be cut off, many projects, including those in the list which I shall print in the RECORD, will never be completed unless some future provision be made for their completion.

Mr. President, it is apparent that consideration of the bill cannot be completed this afternoon, and if it meets with the approval of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of other matters.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. For what purpose?

Mr. BONE. I have a matter I should like to present formally so as not to take up any time tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator wait just a moment until I dispose of another matter?

Mr. BONE. Very well.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, at a former session of the Senate, the Senate passed the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization. The Committee on Rules of the Senate had reported two amendments to the joint resolution, one increasing the Senate membership to nine and another increasing the House membership to nine. When the joint resolution was considered in the Senate I stated that it was my information that the body at the other end of the Capitol did not desire the adoption of the amendment which increased the House membership, and upon that representation the Senate passed the joint resolution carrying an increased membership on the part of the Senate and limiting the House membership to seven.

The body at the other end of the Capitol has reached the conclusion, as I anticipated in the beginning might be the case, that the membership of each body on the joint committee should be the same, and therefore that the amendment which the Senate disagreed to, increasing the House membership on the committee from seven to nine, should be reconsidered and agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair interrupt the Senator from Arkansas to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is my purpose to ask the Senate to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading and passed, and then to reconsider the amendment to which I have referred, and agree to that amendment, which was disagreed to when the joint resolution was before the Senate, so that it will provide for increasing the membership of the House on the joint committee to nine.

I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution read a third time and passed may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on page 1, line 9, proposing to increase the membership of the House on the joint committee from seven to nine was disagreed to may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now ask that the amendment be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine", so as to make the paragraph read:

The joint committee shall be composed of nine members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and nine members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now ask that the amendments be engrossed and the joint resolution read a third time.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to present a matter which will take only a moment, and my purpose in offering it now is in order to avoid discussion of it tomorrow.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on page 2 relating to compensation for personal and professional services, and the like, be reconsidered, and I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment which I should like to have considered at this time.

I will read the provision of the amendment which I desire to tender. I should like to have the Senators examine line 18, on page 2, where I am proposing to add the following words, "except in case of special investigating committees of the Senate, such committees shall have authority to employ not to exceed one expert at a compensation of not to exceed $450 per month."

Let me say to the Members of the Senate that my purpose in suggesting this amendment arises both out of my own experience on an investigating committee and out of the experience of other Members of the Senate who have discussed with me at various times, and on the floor of the Senate, some of the rather acute problems the committees face in not being able to secure the type of experts they have desired for professional work.

I think it is unnecessary for me to recall to the memories of Senators the fact that a Senate committee retained the services of Mr. Pecora, who has subsequently been made a member of the Supreme Court of the State of New York; and I think we may agree that Mr. Pecora is an able gentleman.

I really feel that those of us on this floor who are lawyers realize how difficult it will be in the future to procure for $300 a month the services of an able man—and I mention Mr. Pecora as an example—and have him come to Washington to assist those of us who may be members of investigating committees. It seems to me it is asking a great deal of a man to abandon his practice and come here for such compensation, when the committee is endeavoring to obtain the services of an able and skillful man to direct the committee activities.

I do not wish to take further time. I merely desire to express to the Senate the thought that I believe we are justified in making an exception, so that our committees, the members of which have an ambition to get at the facts and who cannot accomplish that result with the aid of inept persons, may secure the services of able assistants. I feel Senators will agree with me in the statement that it is wise for the Senate to give the committees this much latitude. It might possibly be abused, but I cannot conceive of its being abused, because I would then have to assume that the members of the committees are going to make very bad blunders in hiring men.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I desire to say to the Senator that I do not know who originated the proposal limiting the compensation of an employee of an investigating committee to $3,600 a year. I am of the opinion that it is unwise as to certain employees, and there should be some latitude, some discretion left with the committee. Whenever we seek an attorney to conduct an investigation, and can pay no more than $3,600 a year we must employ some man who is not competent to conduct the investigation; or, secondly, we must employ some man who has a hobby which is the subject of the investigation, and a man with a hobby, who is given the power of a chief investigator, is a dangerous man. The third alternative is that we would be likely to employ an attorney who would accept the employment and make the sacrifice financially in order to procure the attendant publicity. I am giving those three alternatives; there may be an exception, but I agree that the limitation of $3,600 is unwise.

I should not like to have action on the amendment of the Senator today, but should like to have it go over until tomorrow, because I have one or two suggestions I wish to make to him which I believe would be of some possible assistance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in line with what the Senator from South Carolina has said, it ought to be borne in mind also that the $3,600 lawyer we would be authorized to employ for an investigating committee, a committee investigating matters important enough to occupy the attention of the Senate and of the committee, must compete with the most skilled and expert lawyers who can be brought here by those who are being investigated during the course of the hearings. It is really a travesty, and somewhat of a humiliating situation, when we have to limit to $3,600 a year the compensation we pay to lawyers who must go into these matters, and who have to compete with the skilled, high-priced lawyers who can be retained by parties being investigated.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina desires that the matter go over, of course I have no objection. I really bring the subject to the attention of the Senate because I feel I am doing the Senate a service in reviving interest in it.

The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from South Carolina have made out a better case than I could have made out. I am sure all the lawyers in this body realize, without any argument, the necessity of our making out a good case when we go into an investigation. We do not desire to have any of our committees employ an inept person, or a person coming within the categories mentioned. If we have any pride in our work and are spending a lot of money, we want to have the job done well, and the only way to get it done satisfactorily is to secure a good lawyer to handle it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment is a very sensible suggestion. Ordinarily a restriction or limitation of $3,600 might work out very well, and we might leave the language just as it is, but in a special case, such as has been suggested by the Senator from Washington, this body can modify the rule, just as the Senator proposes to modify it, in order to obtain really high-class legal assistance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield further, his amendment limits the committee to the employment of one expert. Of course that employee may be a lawyer or he may be an accountant. I doubt the wisdom of limiting the committee to the employment of one. I think the increase ought to apply to any attorney who is qualified to investigate. The Senator knows that when we send an accountant into a bank or a railroad office or stock market he is supposed to know what he is doing, and we ought to be able to command the services of the best, and men like accountants cannot make a sacrifice in order to get a reputation, because there is nothing in the future for them so far as reputation is concerned. They cannot go on the Supreme Bench, and they cannot get the publicity which a lawyer who is conducting an investigation might receive. I think that before tomorrow it might be well to consider whether the Senator would not desire to broaden the amendment a little.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to conclude what I have to say by suggesting that I wholly agree with the views of the Senator from Kentucky. I think it is not wise for us to tie our own hands. I know there has been opposition expressed to the thought to which we are giving currency here, and I feel that the committees themselves should ultimately determine how many experts they desire to employ. I should be very happy to broaden the terms of the amendment. I am perfectly willing to have it go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, our Father in Heaven, how wonderful are the works of Thy hands; what wisdom, what power, and what majesty back of all. Thou art the dearest and the nearest of all friends before whom we are perfectly known. Amid conflicting and contending forces may we do Thy will and measure up to the strength and the dignity of our manhood; we realize that whatever else is of value in life, character rises superior to all. We pray Thee, compassionate Father, to help us develop those qualities which are most desirable in the eyes of God and man. May this be a good week; let Thy richest blessings descend upon our Speaker and the Congress; quicken every impulse that makes for wise statesmanship; Father, preserve them in good health and strength. Almighty God, the moment is heavy as our hearts turn yonder to Thy ailing children amid their desolation and destruction. O give emancipation to the mourners and the martyrs. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 29, 1937, was read and approved.

No. 165) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times, and, with accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH reserved all points of order on the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it fair to the House to state the program for today. Of course, this is Consent Calendar day and the calendar will be called. There are only three bills on the calendar that are eligible for consideration. After that, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] will take up the independent offices appropriation bill for general debate.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 81, a joint resolution to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization, with a Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object to ask a question, what is the effect of this amendment? Does it increase the House membership on the committee from seven to nine?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. No. It increases the Senate membership from seven to nine. The House membership remains the same.

Mr. McCORMACK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire whether or not the joint committee makes recommendations to the House and the Senate, or, as far as recommendations are concerned, whether the House and Senate committee, for all practical purposes, sit concurrently?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. This joint committee, of course, does not report or recommend legislation to either body. Each body has its own legislative committee which will draft legislation. They sit together for the purpose of investigation and conferring.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think that answers my inquiry; otherwise I would certainly object to the Senate even having the same number as the House, because ordinarily on joint committees the House membership would be anywhere from 3 to 4 to 1. Under those circumstances, I can see no objection, because the House committee makes its own recommendations to the House.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we could not hear what the gentleman from New York said in response to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. This is a joint committee consisting of nine Senators and seven Members of the House. It is really an investigating committee. Any legislation proposed, of course, would be recommended to each body by its own committee. In the House the seven Members would handle the legislation. There are two separate committees, and the members of those two separate committees are also members of this conferring or collaborating committee.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand it, the Senate would have nine members on that "collaborating" committee and the House only seven?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. That does not sound exactly democratic to me.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Well, this is a Senate government.

Mr. RANKIN. It sounds like patronage. If that were what is involved, I might agree that it is a Senate government, but this is a question that involves governmental reorganization. With 96 Senators and 435 Members of the House, and the House supposed to do a majority of the work at any rate, it does not seem to me this "collaborating" committee, as the gentleman calls it, and I presume that designation is correct, should be composed of nine members from the Senate and only seven from the House. The fact of the matter is, if there is going to be a majority from either House, it ought to be the other way around.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman is complaining of a condition that is deep-rooted. I am perfectly willing he should act as a committee of one to try to change it. I abandoned all hope years ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. What reason was given by the Senate why they should have more members on this committee—why their proportion should be increased?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Because there were so many candidates, as I understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. It has been reported in the newspapers that they increased the Senate membership on the committee in order entirely to submerge the Byrd committee, and be sure and have members who would blindly carry out the President's recommendations.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I do not think so. The Byrd committee still functions as an independent unit, as I understand it.

Mr. SNELL. No; I understand they were to be a part of this committee, but they increased the membership so the Byrd committee would not have a dominating influence on the reorganization. That is the reason, I have heard. I am asking the gentleman the question.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Senator BYRD is a member of the committee; and in the debates appearing at page 552 of the RECORD it is definitely stated that the Byrd committee would not be interfered with at all in functioning, if it desires.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that; but the gentleman has not answered my question. It was stated in the papers that they were going to put additional administration men on the committee so they could control this committee and not give the Byrd representation a fair opportunity to go forward and do what they wanted to do. This is a question I should be glad to have the gentleman answer.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I cannot, of course, recognize an administration man when I see him, so I do not know whether what the gentleman states is correct or not.

Mr. SNELL. But some reason has developed recently why they want to increase the Senate membership, has there not?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I understand, to be frank with the gentleman, that it was done to take care of the various factions—I think that is the word used.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman. The representatives of the administration are to be added in order to shut off the other fellows who really want an honest reorganization.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York will yield, most of us only know what appeared in the press, but I am told the reason for the increased number on the part of the Senate, I may say to the minority leader [Mr. SNELL], was made directly at the request of the minority leader of the Senate to maintain their ratio policy on committees. In other words, under that policy it was necessary to increase the number to nine, but on a vote the seven of the House will equal the nine of the Senate.

Mr. SNELL. They are much more considerate to the minority than they ever have been in the past; and this is not the real reason, I may say to my friend from Missouri. That was not the reason assigned in the newspapers, and I am inclined to believe the news items in this instance are absolutely correct.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would it not be possible to increase House membership on this committee at least to nine, thus giving us the same representation the Senate has?

So far as I am concerned, I am not willing for the Senate to become the entire Congress of the United States. If we are going to have representative government, it is about time that the House asserted itself and began to function as the real legislative body. I am not willing to create a committee, even though it is just a "collaborating" committee, and give to the Senate greater membership on it than the House has. Now, if we are going to deal with the Senate, their demand for a greater membership on the committee may be all right with some Members, but it is not all right with me for them to have more members on the committee than the House is going to have.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. May I state this to the gentleman from Mississippi, if this were a legislative committee, if this committee were to make up a bill and it were its function to make up a bill and submit it to each branch of the Congress, if it had anything to do except what was so well said by the gentleman from New York, simply to make an investigation, if at the hearings there is to be a vote on anything, it would be different. There will be one vote in the Senate and one in the House. So far as this committee is concerned they will not vote numerically. This was specifically stated in the Senate during consideration of this matter; so it does not seem to me that it makes any difference whatever if the Senate has nine instead of seven. If it needs the extra number to take care of the minorities of the Senate, it appears to me that under the circumstances we should not object.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that this is more important than if it were a committee to prepare a bill to be passed by Congress. This is the reorganization that goes to the very vital operations, one might say, of the Government. Now, it may be that after they get all their plans worked out, after the Senate Members have worked them out, it may be that they would say: "Now, if you want this, you gentlemen can take it"; and we will probably take it. But we know they are going to accept what is worked out.

It seems to me that the House ought to have reasonable representation on the committee that works out the plan. That is what I am talking about. This senatorial arrogation of the right to "talk down hill" to the House has long since worn threadbare with me. This committee is going to work out the plan, and for this reason I do not think we ought to permit the Senate to select a larger membership on the committee than the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does not the gentleman know that if there were seven House members and one Senate member that the Senator would be the chairman of the committee?

Mr. RANKIN. He would not be if the gentleman from Mississippi happened to be one of the members of the committee, or if the gentleman from New York happened to be one of the members of the committee. There may be Members here who would yield to one Senate member on a committee composed of one Senate member and seven House members, but there are other Members of the House who would not stand for it. This is a very vital proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, for the time being I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 81, to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization, with a Senate amendment, for immediate consideration as a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the Senate amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman called this up as a privileged matter. On what ground is this a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], under paragraph 2 of rule XXIV of the House Manual it is stated:

> Business on the Speaker's table shall be disposed of as follows: Messages from the President shall be referred to the appropriate committees without debate. Reports and communications from heads of departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and bills, resolutions, and messages from the Senate may be referred to the appropriate committees in the same manner and with the same right of correction as public bills presented by Members.

Here is the pertinent part in answer to the gentleman's inquiry:

> But House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, and I have no objection to the consideration of this matter, but I wondered if it was a matter that could be taken up without being referred back to the committee for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule which the Chair has just read, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that it may be brought up in this manner.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. Is this amendment debatable?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has the floor.

Mr. RANKIN. I understood the previous question had been asked for.

The SPEAKER. That was an error.

Mr. RANKIN. If this matter is debatable, I want to be heard in opposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RANKIN. How much time has the gentleman at his disposal?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is entitled to 1 hour, and he may yield such part as he desires.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. I wish the gentleman could yield me 20 minutes. I might want to yield some time to other Members. This thing should not be railroaded through here without the Members' investigating it. I submit there is a question of the prerogatives of this House involved that I do not think ought to be passed off lightly.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] 20 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes of that time.

Mr. Speaker, the time has been when the House of Representatives was the premier legislative body of this Government, and if we are going to have representative government in this country we must restore it to that position. We cannot do so by continuing to assume an attitude of inferiority before another body.

This question of reorganization is a very serious one. It is admitted this plan will not save the Government any money. Some say it will make for efficiency, but what is called efficiency invariably means further concentration of power. If this change is going to be made, and if we are to work out a reorganization plan, the Members of the House ought to have at least as much voice in the working out of that plan as the Members of the Senate, because, as I said a while ago, whatever plan is laid before you will pass. Whatever plan is finally adopted and laid before the two groups of memberships of the committee will be adopted.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman know of any committee that can function without going through the semblance of a vote? When the committee makes a recommendation they will have to vote?

Mr. RANKIN. Why, certainly.

Mr. O'MALLEY. And the weight of a vote decides the recommendation?

Mr. RANKIN. If we give the Senate nine members on this committee they are going to write the report.

Mr. Speaker, I was one of the men who led the fight in this House against increasing the term of Members of the House to 4 years, because I believe one of the wisest provisions in the Constitution is the one which holds the Representatives directly responsible and close to the people of this country.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. In just a moment.

We have to account for our conduct here every 2 years. We are the representative body of this Government. The Members of the other body are elected every 6 years. Whenever you go to minimizing your importance in this House, you are not so much minimizing your own importance, as you are minimizing the importance of representative government. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. There can be no question but that there is great merit in the position that the gentleman has taken. Certainly there ought to be equal representation on the committee. If there are good reasons why the Senate should have nine members on this committee, there are equally good reasons why the House should have the same number. The question which ought to concern the House is the effect such a set-up will have upon the country. There cannot be any question but that the impression will be created that the Senate, so far as this joint action is concerned, preponderates in influence. If the House saw fit, it might have only one member with an equal voting strength with the nine Senate members, but that would not be well and would not create a good impression.

I am wondering if the controversy might not be solved satisfactorily to all concerned by increasing the House representation from seven to nine. Has the gentleman raised that inquiry?

Mr. RANKIN. No; but I am ready to raise it now. If the gentleman from New York will offer an amendment to that effect, I will not object.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Of course, I do not propose to offer such an amendment. I may say to the gentleman that the matter has been considered fairly. The Senate was informed that it was the attitude of the leadership of the House that seven members would be satisfactory to the House, even though the Senate had nine.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Rules Committee one or two questions, if the gentleman will permit. As I understand, the present amendment provides for nine Members of the Senate and seven of the House. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that we should have nine on the committee or the Senate should be restrained from increasing its number by two. I should like to ask the chairman of the Rules Committee if we refuse to accept the Senate amendment, would not the resolution go to conference?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I think so.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from New York and to the other Members of the House that I do not have much time, and some other Members want to speak on this question. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to concede to the Senate all of its prerogatives, all its powers and all its influence, but if the American people are going to have representative government, they are going to have it largely at this end of the Capitol. This is just a beginning. We must regain the prerogatives that have been gradually taken from us. The House of Representatives must become again the premier legislative body of the Government, and I am not only going to oppose this change, but I shall oppose any attempt from now on to minimize the importance or the influence of the House of Representatives and to emphasize the importance or the influence of the United States Senate, and I say this with all deference to that body. If we are going to have representative government it is time we exercised our prerogatives here.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me a moment to ask a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. Getting back to my question of a few moments ago, if we refuse to accept the Senate amendment and the bill goes to conference, where will the conferees come from?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. From the Rules Committee. It is a rather strange thing to have a conference from the Rules Committee, but that is what would happen.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman if an opportunity will be given the House, if the Senate amendment is adopted, to vote on an amendment to increase the House membership to nine, or is it his purpose to move the previous question?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Personally it is of no concern to me whether the number is seven or nine.

Mr. JONES. I understand that.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. There is no Member of this body who has fought for years against the overwhelming and dominating attitude of another body more than I have.

Mr. JONES. I agree with that.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I have complained about it in and out of season, so whether it is seven or nine means nothing to me, except that certain reasons were advanced to me whereby the House could function with seven without opening membership on the committee to two additional members.

Mr. JONES. The question I ask is, if we adopt the Senate amendment, will the gentleman then permit an opportunity for an amendment to be offered to increase the House membership to nine, or does the gentleman intend to move the previous question, and in this way cut off all opportunity to offer such an amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. My present intention is to move the previous question.

Mr. JONES. Then will the gentleman yield for the purpose of permitting an amendment to the Senate amendment to be offered or an amendment to the resolution to be offered along the same line?

Mr. MICHENER. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. There is a very interesting colloquy going on over on the other side. Some very important questions are being asked and they are questions that will determine votes and we cannot hear a word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order the House is not in order. The point of order is well taken. The House will be in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker I may state to the gentleman that the substance of the colloquy between the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and myself was that the gentleman asked me if I proposed to yield for amendments or did I intend to move the previous question. I said that my present intention is to move the previous question and not yield for an amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question in that connection?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Would it be permissible, before the gentleman moves the previous question, to offer an amendment by way of a substitute which would increase the House membership on the joint committee to nine?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Of course, I do not intend to yield the floor for that purpose, I shall say frankly to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Then the House will not have an opportunity to express an opinion on the subject unless it votes down the motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. That is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. As I understand the gentleman from New York, his heart is not in this proposition, but he does not intend to relinquish his efforts to put this across and in that way accommodate the Senate?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I am just a servant doing my duty, that is all.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman that I am inclined to agree with the attitude taken by the gentleman from Mississippi and the Rules Committee of the Senate, which reported out this resolution with the recommendation that there be nine Members from the House. There was objection to that part of the Senate committee recommendation, according to the RECORD of Friday, and without debate the amendment to increase the number of House Members to nine was rejected and the House was left with seven members. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from New York, in view of the language in this resolution and the paramount importance of this problem before the Congress now, which is one we must solve—that is, reduce the expenses of government and reorganize very drastically—do not the duties of this joint committee call for action by a joint committee and not by the Senate, separate from the House? As I understand, they are to report jointly from time to time the results of their investigations, with such recommendations as it deems advisable. All expenditures by the committee are to be made by action of the joint committee, not by a separate vote of the Senate group and the House group. Anyone reading the duties and powers of the joint committee provided for in House Joint Resolution 81 can come to no conclusion other than that it is contemplated, and technically the language demands joint action and decision. I agree thoroughly that sitting down with 16 members on this joint committee, the House having 7 and the Senate 9, we begin with the cards stacked against us. I hope the House insists upon an equal number being provided.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield to me to submit an amendment to be read by the Clerk?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Just for information; yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANKIN offers the following amendment to the Senate amendment: After the word "nine" insert "and"; on page 1, line 9, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine."

Mr. RANKIN. That gives nine Members of the House and nine Members of the Senate.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. If I yield the floor to permit an amendment, will it be in order under the rule—I have some doubt about it?

The SPEAKER. In reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from New York, the Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman and the attention of the House to the following rule.

Section 526 of Jefferson's Manual reads:

But the House cannot recede from or insist on its own amendment with an amendment, for the same reason that it cannot send to the other House an amendment to its own act after it has passed the act.

Under that rule it seems to the Chair that the House having acted on the matter and the Senate having accepted that language, it would not be open for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. We have a right to accept the Senate amendment with an amendment. We are not attempting to amend the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's amendment is to the text of the House bill.

Mr. RANKIN. I beg the Chair's pardon. After the word "nine" in the Senate amendment it is to strike out the word "seven" in line 9 and insert the word "nine." I am proposing to amend the Senate amendment. We have a right to accept the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi is to amend the text of the joint resolution. Under this rule that amendment cannot be in order.

Mr. JONES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES. If it is not in order to offer an amendment such as the gentleman from Mississippi proposes, if the Senate amendment were rejected and sent back to the Senate the purpose of the amendment could be accomplished.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that on the premise laid by him if the Senate amendment were voted down the Senate could reconsider its action and increase the number of the House committee.

Mr. JONES. If it were sent back to the Senate would not it go as an original proposition so they could recede from their amendment and take up the bill as an original measure and put in nine Members of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Senate could reconsider its action.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. My amendment states:

I offer the following amendment to the Senate amendment.

I am not trying to amend what the House has done. It is specifically written that it is an amendment to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not confining himself in his amendment to the Senate amendment, which deals only with the number of Senators on the joint committee; but he goes further down in the paragraph and adds additional matter to the text, to which both Houses have already agreed.

Mr. RANKIN. All I do is to offer an amendment to the Senate amendment, not striking out their number but adding to ours, making them equal. I submit that under the rules of the House I have a right to offer an amendment to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the amendment offered by the gentleman must deal with the matter the Senate amendment deals with, as shown by the resolution. The Chair makes the further statement that the Chair has no disposition whatever to prevent the House from expressing itself upon the attitude assumed by the gentleman from Mississippi, but when the Chair is called upon to make a parliamentary decision, he is bound, of course, to conform with the rules and precedents of the House.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FULLER. Cannot that be amended by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The only way under the rules of the House by which this situation could be changed would be by a concurrent resolution, agreed to by both Houses, changing the text of the matter already passed upon by the House and accepted by the Senate.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. The discussion of this matter has proceeded upon the premise that someone would make a point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] should yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] for the purpose of offering an amendment, and if the gentleman from Mississippi should offer the amendment, and no one should make a point of order, then unquestionably it could be put upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The only difficulty with that proposition is that the Chair feels that it is his duty to protect the integrity of the proceedings between the two Houses of Congress, and when the Chair is confronted with a proposition of that sort, there is but one answer to it, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. If the Senate amendment were to be voted down and the matter sent to conference, in conference would it be possible to amend the numbers with reference to both the House and the Senate representation?

The SPEAKER. The conferees would have no greater authority than the House. This is a very unusual situation which has been presented here. As the Chair stated a moment ago, if this motion should be voted down, the matter could then be taken up again by the Senate and they could voluntarily change the text of their amendment. Then the House would have an opportunity to accede, and the Chair is of opinion that if it were presented to the Senate that the attitude of the House is in favor of nine members on this commission, the Senate would readily accept that.

Mr. RANKIN. Then the only thing we can do is either adopt the Senate amendment or vote it down?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. RANKIN. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment. I promised to yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, my position on this question is absolutely in line with the position taken by the gentleman from Mississippi. I reserved the right to object to ask some questions of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and if I were alone in my thoughts I felt that I would not make an objection, although I have serious thoughts on the advisability of the House concurring in the Senate amendment, with a membership on the joint committee on the part of the Senate of nine and on the part of the House of seven.

For a number of years the Senate has been gradually encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the House. That usually manifests itself through the medium of tax legislation. The members of the Committee on Ways and Means have had to be constantly on their guard in respect to amendments put in the nature of riders on bills in the Senate, which invade the constitutional prerogatives and duties of the House. All revenue legislation must originate in the House under the Constitution, and there have been indirect encroachments upon the jurisdiction of the House. A joint committee should have about three to four members of the House to one of the Senate, if it were a joint committee in fact. In view of the fight being made I think the House should insist upon a position of at least equality. Assuming that the House and Senate committee do act concurrently, as stated today, nevertheless, when they sit jointly many questions of jurisdiction arise, many questions on details arise. Points of order may be raised and many votes will be taken in the joint committee, and with the House having only seven members and the Senate nine, the House may be placed in a very embarrassing position.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The practical point is this: The House passed its resolution several days ago. Seven Members have been appointed. Everyone thought, therefore, that the appointment of the House was closed. Furthermore, I thought all the time, and it was brought out in debate in the Senate last week that in all the votes respecting matters in this joint committee, the House would have a vote and the Senate would have a vote. Practically, I do not think there are going to be many things, if any, except probably the organization of the committee, upon which there will be votes. In my opinion, this is an investigating committee or commission.

Mr. McCORMACK. Would the gentleman agree to nine Members in the Senate and seven in the House if this were an original proposition?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would be of no moment to me if the committees have equal power and equal authority.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, would the gentleman say the Senate should have greater membership on a committee than the House?

Mr. RAYBURN. On a committee?

Mr. McCORMACK. On any committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. No. But this is not a committee. This is not a legislative committee. This is not a conference committee. It does not have any of the power or authority of a legislative or conference committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. But the committee has legislative functions and legislative duties. The gentleman from Maryland referred to the fact that it was a joint committee, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has assured the House that they will act concurrently, and I am sure the gentleman from New York, from a practical angle, knows what he is talking about.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I think I can solve this by proceeding in accordance with my heart.

I will withdraw my motion to concur in the Senate amendment and move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] withdraws his motion to agree to the Senate amendment and now moves to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by including an address delivered by Hon. Robert H. Jackson, Assistant Attorney General, at the annual dinner of the New York Bar Association at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert a radio address delivered by a former Member of this House, Mr. Anning S. Prall, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the subject of the address?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The part that radio has played in the floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Will the gentleman from New York withhold his objection to my request?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I reserve it.

Mr. MAVERICK. Is it not usual to permit the inclusion of these speeches by high officials of the Government? If the gentleman disagrees, it must be because of differences with the opinions stated here, because he has not objected to the other request. It is only fair that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have opinions of various sorts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have been in consultation with a good many Members, and I find it difficult to lay down a strict rule-of-thumb about this. Apparently the gentleman from Texas would be perfectly willing to see the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD converted into a Literary Digest. For more than one reason I am opposed to that, in view of recent developments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK]?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION OF PARIS, 1937

The Clerk called the first business on the Consent Calendar, House Joint Resolution 52, relating to the participation by the United States in the International Exposition of Paris, 1937.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman's purpose in doing that? Is it the gentleman's intention to bring it up under a rule or under suspension later on?

Mr. BLOOM. Answering the gentleman, permit me to state that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has declared that he is going to object on the floor to all bills of this kind. Until we have some understanding with the gentleman from New York, I have determined that the best thing to do is to ask to pass the bill over without prejudice.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman that I also objected. The proceedings may not show it, but I objected as well as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. BLOOM. If that procedure is going to be followed on all of these matters, then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]?

There was no objection.

AMENDING SECTION 23 OF IMMIGRATION ACT OF FEBRUARY 5, 1917

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 26, to amend section 23 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 874), as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 102).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I trust the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. O'DAY] will ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice. I have just secured a copy of the bill a few moments ago, and there are certain features of it that I desire to consider before the bill is passed.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 28, to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or nonquota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his objection? Both bills passed the House at the last session, but were held up in the Senate because of the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I may say to the gentlewoman from New York that my attention was called to the bill only a few moments ago and that I have not had an opportunity to study it. From a hasty examination, I do not think the title as set forth in the calendar is quite in accordance with the bill as written. I should like to have an opportunity to study the bill.

Mrs. O'DAY. Perhaps I can explain the bill to the gentleman.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The third section of the bill on page 2 states that any marriage which is judicially annulled retroactively to date of marriage shall be evidence of fraud and cause for deportation.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that a complicated matter like immigration should not be taken up by unanimous consent but should come up for proper consideration by the House on Calendar Wednesday, and I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object to the request that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the Consent Calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Starting with no. 16 on the Consent Calendar are several bills which appear to be private in character. Although the bills provide for payment to a foreign country, the payment is on behalf of citizens of the country. Inasmuch as the bills will not be called, I cannot, of course, make a point of order against them; but my parliamentary inquiry is whether these bills are properly on the Consent Calendar. Should they not be on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Michigan, the Chair is of the opinion that the bills to which the gentleman refers are properly on the Consent Calendar under the rules of the House. The gentleman will note that these bills provide for the payment of moneys to a foreign government; and, under the rules, they are public bills and properly on the Consent Calendar.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

Pending this motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue throughout such portion of the afternoon as we may have speakers to occupy, the time to be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4064, the independent offices appropriation bill, 1938, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

At the request of Mr. WOODRUM the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have requested this time in order that I may discuss a subject concerning which there is considerable contrariety of opinion. I believe, however, the differences have arisen largely from a lack of understanding and information.

I wish to talk about aviation in the lighter-than-air field; in other words, about airships; and may I say by way of general preface that I am not connected with any person, firm, company, or corporation in any way interested in the production or operation of airships. I shall not talk with reference to any particular bill or any particular type of construction, but I shall seek merely to give information that I trust may be helpful in our consideration of this general subject and its importance to our country. I wish also to say in the beginning that I am talking purely as a layman. I can give no technical or expert advice, but there are certain things coming within the observation of a layman which stress the importance of this particular matter.

My interest in lighter-than-air craft was stimulated originally by studies with reference to helium gas, and those of you who have served in this body for some years are familiar with the fact that I have spoken in this Chamber on several occasions concerning it. In the early days when I first made bold to offer remarks on this subject it was not generally known, perhaps even by some of my colleagues here, whether I was discussing a patent medicine or a breakfast food.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that there is considerable antipathy toward this subject in general, that lighter-than-air aviation has been thought by many not to be practicable, that dirigibles are hazardous toys and dangerous playthings. Perhaps this conclusion has been predicated upon certain calamities which have befallen us in the operation of our airships in the Navy. It should be borne in mind, of course, with reference to these disasters in our own country that they resulted from our first efforts in such construction and such operation.

The first automobiles were not practicable, the first flying machines were dangerous and hazardous, as may also have been the first boat and the first train, yet we do not hesitate to go on with our progressive development in these various methods of transportation because of the fact that we have had disasters and loss of life.

It so happens that most of our airship disasters might have been avoided. I think the chief authority in this country with reference to lighter-than-air craft is Commander C. E. Rosendahl, who, before he joined the Navy, lived in the district which I have the honor to represent. By training, by study, and by experience he is eminently qualified to speak upon this subject. In an article written by him last year he goes on to show that the human equation has likely been largely responsible for such losses as we have sustained in our operation of these ships, and I shall quote an excerpt from that article:

> Where there has been no clear explanation, the public naturally draws the conclusion that there must be something basically wrong with the airship as a type. Yet from a study of available information, it is my opinion that in each of the half dozen major airship losses since the World War the human equation stands responsible to a considerable degree. I believe each one of them was to a large extent "avoidable." Let's glance at a few.
> The ZR–2 while still in the hands of the British builders was maneuvered severely at low altitudes, whereas everyone concerned should have remembered that the ship was copied from a German high-altitude bomber, purposely of light construction in order to attain great altitude, and therefore was intended for its maximum maneuvering only in the upper air where the loads on the ship were correspondingly less. No one would expect a light, fast motorboat to endure a beating from the open sea; yet when the ZR–2 was subjected to operating conditions for which she was not intended the resulting tragedy was unfairly discounted as only another example of airship frailty.
> The semirigid airship Roma, while being maneuvered at high speed at a very low altitude, found itself unable to "pull out" before flying into high-tension wires. Being inflated with hydrogen, the result was inevitable.
> The British R–101, after only a few hours in flight following a major alteration, set out in the face of unfavorable weather admittedly because of political considerations. The ship lacked certain elementary features, such as control from the control car, of emergency ballast in the ends of the ship, a feature which had been incorporated in every previous airship. Losing altitude presumably because of gas-cell deflation forward, and apparently because ballast or other weights could not be dropped quickly enough forward to compensate, the ship flew into a low hill in France. That in itself might have meant a few broken limbs and perhaps some structural damage, but being inflated with hydrogen the resulting total loss by fire was inevitable.
> Coming nearer home, it is my firm belief, as previously expressed, after a study of all the factors, that the Akron simply flew into the Atlantic Ocean at a ground speed of 100 miles per hour or more, during, but not because of, a storm. The effects of the storm on the ship were only of an incidental nature, such as causing the altimeter to falsify the true altitude. In my opinion, the loss of the Macon was likewise avoidable, for hindsight now shows us that the collective judgment of all concerned in delaying structural reinforcements previously known to be necessary was in error.
> Summed up briefly, the human equation in design, construction, and operation must keep apace of the material development, but, unfortunately, it seems that in every pioneering endeavor in the world the human equation has advanced mainly only by sad experience. In this respect a real study of the situation shows that the airship has been no worse, if indeed as bad, as many other developments, such as, for instance, the submarine.

Mr. Chairman, in contrast with our naval operations, let me call attention to the fact that in the commercial operation of airships more than a quarter of a million people have been carried as passengers, and not one has been killed or suffered injury. So I am talking about this matter today not so much perhaps from the governmental angle as from the commercial angle, that we may give to our Navy and our armed forces such equipment as may be necessary for their operations in this regard, but that we may give also proper stimulus to commerce to the end that we may not be outstripped by other nations when we are the favored nation by reason of the fact that we have practically a monopoly of the known supply of helium in the world.

Let us look just a moment at some of the results from the operation of commercial airships. I call attention first to the operation of the blimps by the Goodyear Co. in our own country. They started their fleet in 1925 with a single small ship, the Pilgrim, which is now in the Smithsonian Institution. They expanded at their peak to six ships. They are at present operating four—one in Washington, one in Los Angeles, and two in Florida. Up to the end of the year 1936 these ships had flown 2,463,603 miles; they had carried 237,212 passengers, and not a single passenger had suffered even so much as the scratch of a finger.

Let us look at it from the standpoint of the commercial operation of these dirigibles by Germany.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to be interrupted?

Mr. LANHAM. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Does the gentleman have right at this point the comparative figures covering other types of planes, how many passengers carried, and the fatalities?

Mr. LANHAM. No; I have not. I am simply trying to show in my remarks, and in calling attention to this matter, that the operation of airships has been shown to be practical from a commercial standpoint both in this country and abroad. It is also, I think, an important adjunct of our naval operations, and we should not quickly draw conclusions from the unfortunate pioneering accidents which have occurred in our naval service.

For 8 continuous years the Graf Zeppelin, which was the first airship used for aerial oceanic transport, has operated with great success, and the statistics with reference to it up to September 1936, are as follows:

Number of flights, 555; total hours in flight, 16,000; total distance covered, 1,000,000 miles plus; persons carried, 36,300; passengers carried, 13,000; mail, 91,000 pounds; freight, 126,000 pounds; ocean crossings, 132.

Since being placed in service in March 1936 the Hindenburg had made some 53 flights during the remainder of the year, including 8 round trips between Germany and Rio de Janeiro and 10 North Atlantic round trips, all on schedule. It seems no other type of aircraft has carried a single pay passenger over the North Atlantic.

Mr. Chairman, it has come to be a commonplace thing in South America to see these airships from Germany come and go. On one occasion one of these giants of the air started its trip under weather conditions that forced every other kind of aircraft to remain on the ground. When we look at the results and take into consideration that there have been no passengers injured, more than a quarter of a million of them carried, the Atlantic Ocean crossed over and over again, one of these ships having made a round-the-world trip, not having the advantage of the use of our helium, which is a noninflammable, nonexplosive gas with a buoyancy of 92 percent of that of hydrogen, no one can doubt that this is a subject worthy of our practical consideration. Not only that but travel on these dirigibles is made with greater comfort than with any other method of transportation. There is less noise, less vibration, and the pay load is of very considerable proportions when compared, for instance, with our heavier-than-air ships.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman if he can give us some information about the cost or the expense to the passenger in traveling on these ships? I do not know whether the gentleman has stated anything on that or not.

Mr. LANHAM. I have no information at hand as to the cost of travel on these ships, but that may be ascertained by inquiry at their agencies. Of course, they make a very quick trip across the Atlantic. However, I have some information with reference to the cost to this Government in connection with our airship construction and operation, and it is very much less in its total than the cost of building a single battleship. We now have some splendid lighter-than-air facilities in this country, including, of course, the great hangar at Lakehurst, N. J.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wonder if the gentleman could give me this information: Could the German Zeppelins, which are flown commercially, be flown with helium? What I am trying to arrive at in my own mind is whether helium is practical as a lifting medium.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; helium has been shown to be practical as a lifting medium. It has 92 percent of the buoyancy of hydrogen and can carry a load 92 percent of that which can be carried by a hydrogen-filled ship. The Germans use for fuel a combination, part of which is hydrogen, known as blau gas.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. Can the gentleman throw any light on what happened in America that our lighter-than-air craft suffered disasters while the Germans' have not?

Mr. LANHAM. I can do that, and I intimated that in my opening remarks. Of course, the Germans are much more experienced in the building of these airships than we are. For instance, Germany has built 138 of them; England has built 16; and the United States has built 3. Of course, on account of their experience through all these years, they are much more expert in the construction of airships than we are. We have just started.

Mr. EATON. How many have they lost out of the one-hundred-and-thirty-odd as compared with our three? We have lost all of ours, of course.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; that is true. I stated earlier that some of the reasons for our losses will be set out in extending my remarks. These losses may indicate at first blush, but in no way prove, especially in the light of the practical results, that lighter-than-air aviation is not feasible.

Mr. EATON. I asked the question, because I am convinced if the Germans can do it the Americans ought to be able to do it.

Mr. LANHAM. I am coming to that.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I should like to go on, because I may anticipate some of the gentleman's questions in my further statements.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I would like to know this: Are the German dirigibles inflated with helium?

Mr. LANHAM. They are not. They have no helium. I understand they are inflated with a combination of gasses that they call blau gas, using hydrogen largely as the lifting element.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it explosive?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. But they have had no serious explosions.

Mr. LANHAM. They have not had an accident to a traveling passenger, and they have crossed the ocean time after time, until it is now taken as a matter of fact.

The United States has been very much interested in the peace conference that was held at Buenos Aires. It is recognized that our natural and most normal trade territory is South America, yet here are foreign countries cultivating through these friendly relationships the commercial goodwill of the South American peoples, to whom we could with relative ease send our helium-filled airships on missions of mutual benefit. The Government of Brazil is now building outside Rio de Janeiro a very large hangar to take care of these regularly scheduled flights that are being made there by the German dirigibles.

It seems to me we are overlooking a very fruitful opportunity to link ourselves, both in terms of peace and of commercial relationships, with these neighbors of ours to the south, and that we are sitting by, favored as we are, and letting that great advantage go to countries across the sea. They are capturing our natural, normal trade territory, with which we ought to have relations most harmonious and helpful; and, of course, airship transportation to South America is just as much transoceanic as the crossing of the Atlantic.

I shall not talk at this time—I have on many other occasions in the House—of the advantage to the Navy of airships for the purpose of reconnaissance, and so forth; but I will insert this statement: I recall very definitely that a very great British naval authority made the assertion toward the conclusion of the World War, or shortly thereafter, that one helium-filled dirigible was worth as much in war—they did not have it then, of course—as from three to five cruisers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, the question arises, if Germany can do this, and we are a favored nation in that we have a monopoly of helium which can enable us to operate more safely, why can we not do it? Why should we let them absorb this territory of ours to the south while we have surplus crops and products and nowhere to send them? Of course, one reason is that we have given no stimulus to commercial aviation in the lighter-than-air field. The Merchant Marine Act provides for it in very broad terms. The Department of Commerce and the Department of the Navy are very much interested in this subject, and they have had their commissions appointed that have been giving study to it and their reports have all been favorable. Why, inasmuch as there are many forms of transportation, by land on our trains, in the air by our airplanes, on the water by ships, should not this means of transportation, which has been proven so practical both in this country and abroad, be given the same stimulus in the Merchant Marine Act that is given to other forms of transportation, in order that there may be some inducement and some encouragement in this country to enter this field commercially in order to protect our interests of trade and to promote our interests of peace and harmony?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will be pleased to yield to my friend.

Mr. STEFAN. Would the gentleman care to say, or does the gentleman know, what we are doing in the way of the development of our helium supply?

Mr. LANHAM. Our helium supply is being very well protected, because we have an enormous reserve, where we control the entire geologic structure holding the natural gas that contains the helium. We draw it off and extract the helium as we have need for it. It so happens—and I am coming in just a moment to that phase of the matter—this whole operation has been more or less in a state of standstill recently, and I call attention to this as one reason we have not made greater progress. It is the policy in the Navy, as you know, to send men on tours from one place to another. They serve so long in one capacity and then they go somewhere else and serve in another capacity. The consequence has been that we have little well-trained personnel in the operation of these airships. About the time they have become sufficiently acquainted with the airships and their operation to be really of service, they are transferred to some other branch of the service. This is one reason that in this country there has been successful operation commercially. For instance, I made inquiry of the Goodyear Co. in this regard, and I have this information from them:

> A number of our pilots are well over the 10,000 mark in air hours gained in at least three-fourths of the States of the Union, excepting only the Northwest area. Ten of them are Reserve officers in the United States Navy, eight of them have taken active duty at Lakehurst, and have had one or more training flights to Europe or South America aboard the Hindenburg and the Graf Zeppelin.

In other words, when they have taken these men that we have trained for a short time in our Navy, they have given them the benefit of going on with that training, and we find that they have been operating these dirigibles in this country and have carried more than one-quarter of a million passengers, flown two and a half million miles, without so much as a scratch of a finger in injury of any passenger.

Now, I think our naval policy should be changed in that regard, especially when we are new in this field, that these men may be given continuous training and experience in the operation of lighter-than-air craft. I believe that this project so important to us, and in which I have no interest except as a citizen, may be carried on effectively.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Would the gentleman confine this solely to the Navy?

Mr. LANHAM. No; I would not; although the dirigible is more an adjunct of the Navy than the Army. In fact, the appropriations heretofore have been carried in both the Navy and Army bills.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The supply of helium is confined principally to the State of Texas, is it not?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir; as a matter of fact we have a reserve in Utah. The highest content of helium in natural gas of which I have heard is in the State of Colorado. We have some of it in Pennsylvania, and in other States.

But the singular thing is that though nations have sought it from various sources—Japan even experimenting with the gases from volcanoes—we have in this country for all practical purposes a monopoly of helium and a sufficient volume to carry on operations, if properly conserved, for many, many years.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the price of helium today? The reason I ask is that the gentleman from Texas made a speech on the floor some years ago, and if I remember correctly he said that during the war helium cost about $1,500 a cubic foot, and at that time when he made the speech it had dropped to 4 cents a cubic foot. I have understood that it could be supplied now for 1 cent a cubic foot.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; I have talked about the price of helium several times. Up to the time of the World War it was a chemical curiosity, a plaything of the laboratory, and at that time they had not extracted a cubic foot of helium for less than $1,500. That was obtained by breaking down uranium ore. Later it was discovered in natural gas in Kansas and elsewhere.

During the war the United States Government established experimental plants to extract helium from this gas and brought the price down from $1,500 to 40 cents a cubic foot. They had 210,000 cubic feet, enough to inflate one small ship, on the docks at New Orleans ready to be transported abroad when the armistice was signed. Since that time through our experimentation we have brought it down further, and we can now extract helium from natural gas for from 1 to 1½ cents per cubic foot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. LANHAM. When we stop to think of this great advantage we should consider ourselves very fortunate. When hydrogen becomes highly impregnated with air it becomes so explosive that it has to be released, but we can keep our helium, repurify it at a nominal cost, and use it over and over again; and, necessity being the mother of invention, we have made many discoveries that are most helpful in this regard—one the recovery of water from the exhaust of gasoline motors on dirigibles, by which as the weight is lost by the consumption of fuel that weight is regained in condensing the water from the motors, and we can recover in that way even more than 100 percent of the loss and thereby obviate the necessity of valving the helium. There are many of those things into which I could go, but the thing I am anxious to do in these remarks is to impress the fact that from the standpoint of the airship as an adjunct of the Navy, from the standpoint of the airship in commercial aviation, if given the proper stimulus, lighter-than-air aviation is extremely practical, extremely feasible, as shown by the operations of the German Government, and the Goodyear Co. in this country. The world has gone beyond the phase and the stage of mere experimentation.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the difference in the cost per mile of travel in the gasoline used, we will say, for passengers in a blimp and in an airplane?

Mr. LANHAM. I cannot give the gentleman that, but I can tell the gentleman this, that, for instance, on these splendid flights we are making now across the Pacific, with the China Clipper that carries, I think, six passengers, it has to stop at various places on the way, governed somewhat by the weather; but a dirigible could cover the same distance in the same or less time, because it would not have to stop, and it could carry many more passengers and a very much greater freight load.

Mr. RANKIN. The dirigible also would not have to use power to hold itself in the air.

Mr. LANHAM. No. I am not speaking against the airplane, because I am strong for aviation in all its branches, and just as we use different kinds of airplanes for different kinds of services, in the same way we should use different kinds of dirigibles for different kinds of services. Perhaps the principal trouble in the disasters that we have had has arisen from the fact that the dirigibles were not used for the particular purposes for which these types were adapted.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman has made a very interesting and instructive speech on this important subject. In view of the safety and the availability of helium and its desirability, what is it that is holding it back?

Mr. LANHAM. That is a very interesting question. Germany, for instance, is now going forward on a larger scale and building even larger dirigibles, to carry on this trade, which they have carried on successfully without accident and without loss of life or injury to a passenger. One thing that is holding us up is that there is no stimulation of commercial aviation in the lighter-than-air field, and no adequate provisions for it in our laws. If in our laws, in our Merchant Marine Act, for instance, the same encouragement could be given to private enterprise to construct commercial airships that is given for carrying ocean mail and the carrying of air mail, then there would be some reason for investment in a project of this character, to promote goodwill and expanded trade in this hemisphere and the other.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. JONES. May I suggest in that connection that the control of helium by the Government is so complete that one has to get special permission to use it for commercial purposes and, therefore, can have no assurance under the present enactment.

Mr. LANHAM. That is correct, and in that connection there is a ban in the law against the exportation of helium. It has to be exported in very small volume with the President's consent; and, interesting in that regard is the fact that it has been discovered that helium mixed with oxygen is very helpful by way of relief to those who suffer from asthma, and we adopted an amendment in this body last year providing that the Government might sell to certain hospitals and authorized physicians quantities of helium that would enable them with their machines to relieve asthma patients, and an objection was made to that by companies producing helium commercially in this country because the Government could sell it at a smaller rate than they could sell it, naturally, because they had to have some profit; but that indicates that private capital is even now operating in the production of helium without any stimulus in our law to give them a desirable market for their output.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. SUTPHIN. A moment ago the gentleman referred to the construction of dirigibles. Is it not a fact that we changed the construction from the keel method which the Germans used to the ring method?

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman. There were several changes in construction, and, furthermore—whether there is any truth in it or not I do not know—there was much talk, some of it on the floor of this House, with reference to sabotage in the construction of those dirigibles. Of that I do not know, but I do know that those disasters can be explained, as they have been by Commander Rosendahl on reasonable and plausible grounds, and that the human equation was likely one particular factor leading to them.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. In his extension of remarks, will the gentleman discuss the destruction of the Shenandoah, the Los Angeles, and the Macon, and the bearing of those disasters on the arrested development of airships in this country?

Mr. LANHAM. I shall ask permission to extend my remarks to include a statement made in that regard by Commander C. E. Rosendahl, who is thoroughly familiar, through experience, with this entire matter.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Does not the gentleman think it advisable, in view of the fact that the Germans have constructed lighter-than-air ships and operated them successfully, that we might endeavor to secure one by exchanging cotton, of which we have a surplus at the present time?

Mr. LANHAM. By exchange or by purchase or by whatever method may be necessary, if that is the best way to get a practical dirigible, let us do that; but, at any rate, let us not forsake this field, in which we are favored, and in which experience shows it is practical and feasible to make these transoceanic trips. They are now coming to be taken as a matter of fact, going on day in and day out. Why should we sit serenely and supinely by, favored as we are, and let these other nations promote their commercial enterprises to the loss of our natural trade territory? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has again expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, we have before us in Committee of the Whole House the annual appropriation bill for the support of the so-called independent offices. One of the items in the bill is the appropriation for the support of the office known as the General Accounting Office and the Comptroller General and his assistant. If my recollection serves me right, that appropriation calls for the expenditure of approximately $5,300,000. The fact that this item of appropriation for the support of the Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office is contained in this bill perhaps furnishes me an excuse, if not a good reason, to discuss the origin of the Office itself and, having traced that as briefly as I may, discuss its functions, especially in view of the great task that confronts the Congress, looking toward the reorganization of the executive departments of the Government.

During the World War the Government of the United States of necessity grew in its dimensions by leaps and bounds. Nearly all of that growth was for the purpose of meeting the emergency incident to the Great War. The demobilization period consumed the years 1919 and 1920, speaking generally. Demobilization was accomplished in due time, but it became apparent to the Members of the House and Senate of that day that in coming back to normal condition in government, those who were to manage it, including the members of the legislative branch, were bound to find additional complications and ramifications incident not only to some of the lessons learned in the war itself, but incident, perhaps more especially, to the natural growth of the country.

Prior to 1920, dating clear back to the inception of our Government, there had never been made any especially determined effort to see to it that as the Government, in its executive departments, grew from year to year, it grew in systematic and orderly fashion. Accountability for expenditures authorized in the first instance by Congress, was scattered in pretty nearly all of the departments. Confusion existed; lack of system, and the inevitable waste which comes with an ill-ordered governmental structure. In 1920 the movement for reform achieved great force, and Members of both Houses, looking back over the years, made up their minds that if the Government was to be conducted in orderly fashion from that point on and be put in a position where it could stand the strains which the future might put upon it—of course, the strains are of a financial character principally—it was absolutely necessary to establish a budget system. Several States of the Union had established budget systems prior to that time, but there had been nothing approaching it in the Federal Government.

I think it fair to say that the best minds in both Houses and on each side of the aisle in both Houses, gave their attention to the establishment of a budget system. In 1920 the first effort was made, and a bill was passed establishing the office of Director of the Budget, with duties assigned to him such as you are all familiar with, duties which he still bears. Needless to say, the establishment of that office made it possible for the Congress and the country as a whole to get a better view of the financial condition of the Government; a better view and understanding of the requests for money coming from the Executive, the revenues which might accrue from tax measures, and finally the appropriations made by the Congress itself.

As an integral and essential part of the Budget system, attempted first in 1920, there was established the General Accounting Office and the office of the Comptroller General and Assistant Comptroller General. Around the establishment of the General Accounting Office, and particularly around the establishment of the office of Comptroller General, a considerable controversy took place. The House of Representatives at that time, in passing the Budget bill, provided for the office of Comptroller General, and inserted in the act provisions to the effect that the Comptroller General should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and should serve until he was 70 years of age, or during good behavior. The bill provided that he might be removed by concurrent resolution of the Congress for malfeasance in office, incompetency, or neglect of duty, or he might be removed through impeachment proceedings.

The Senate accepted the House provision in very large measure, and the bill was passed. Woodrow Wilson was President of the United States at that time. If my recollection is correct, each House of Congress was controlled by a majority of the Republican Party, although the majorities were not heavy.

Mr. Wilson vetoed the bill. In his veto message he expressed his regret that he felt impelled to veto the Budget Accounting Act, acknowledging as he did that it would bring about great reforms and emphasizing the fact that his only reason for vetoing it was on account of the provision in the bill which failed to give him, the Chief Executive, the right to remove the Comptroller General. I think it might be of interest to the Members of the Committee who do me the honor to listen to me if I read a portion of President Wilson's veto message of House bill 9783, sent to the Congress on June 4, 1920. I read an excerpt from the veto message:

> I do this with the greatest regret. I am in entire sympathy with the object of this bill and would gladly approve it but for the fact that I regard one of the provisions contained in section 303 as unconstitutional.

I may interject the observation that President Wilson was referring to the power of removal of the Comptroller General when he used that sentence. He goes on to say:

> The effect of this—

That is, the removal provisions which lodged the power in the Congress——

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Did the original bill provide that the President might remove the Comptroller General?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the original bill provided that the Comptroller General should be appointed by the President, but might be removed only by concurrent resolution of the Congress for malfeasance, incompetency, neglect of duty, or by impeachment proceedings. President Wilson went on to say:

> The effect of this provision is to prevent the removal of these officers for any cause except either by impeachment or concurrent resolution of Congress. It has, I think, always been the accepted construction of the Constitution that the power to appoint officers of this kind carries with it as an incident the power to remove. I am convinced that the Congress is without constitutional power to limit the appointing power and its incident, the power of removal.

President Wilson's message gave rise to a very interesting debate. It was submitted, of course, first to the House of Representatives as the body in which the bill had originated. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Good, was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in those days and had charge of the bill during its passage through this body. It will be remembered that he was a most distinguished man and served in this House for many years, later becoming Secretary of War and, unhappily, dying in office. Mr. Good was one of the persons who took part in the discussion of the President's veto. He said on that day immediately after the message was read:

> I regret more than I can express that the President has thought it necessary to veto the Budget bill. I cannot arrive at any conclusion other than that the legal advice he has received as to the constitutional powers of Congress in this respect is, indeed, faulty. In creating the General Accounting Office and providing for the Comptroller General and Assistant Comptroller General the committee was guided by a single thought; that was, that these two officers should be placed upon a plane somewhat comparable to the position occupied by a Federal judge.

That is, the Comptroller General and the Assistant Comptroller General—

> The positions are somewhat judicial, and it was the opinion of the committee that we should remove them as far as possible from political considerations. It was considered that as to the President's appointment, if it was made a political office, the President would, in all likelihood, appoint someone of his political faith. It is the desire of the committee that that situation should be avoided if possible. There is no decision of the Supreme Court construing a statute such as we have attempted to enact. I think it may be stated—> as a general rule that the power given to the President to appoint an officer carries with it the inherent power of removal unless that inherent right or incidental right is taken away by the statute itself; and that is what this Congress intended to do, to take from the President the incidental right of removal and to provide the circumstances and the method of removal.

Said Mr. Good—

The course of the debates on that day indicate very clearly that when the Congress sought to create the office of Comptroller General it did not seek or intend to create an executive office. It sought and intended to create an agency of the Congress itself subject to the Congress, responsible to the Congress; and that in case of need the incumbent could be removed by the Congress.

The purpose of the act, as I recollect it—and I had the honor of serving in the Senate at that time and can remember a great deal of the discussion—was to give to Congress better control over the appropriations which it makes from time to time in the matter of seeing to it that they are made in accordance with the views and intent of the Congress; in other words, that the expenditures themselves are legally made.

After considerable debate upon the veto message the question was laid before the House as to whether the veto message should be sustained or be overridden. The vote upon that occasion was 178 to override the veto and 103 to sustain the veto. A two-thirds vote was lacking and the veto was sustained. It is interesting to note the roll call on that veto message. All party lines were forgotten. Democrats and Republicans joined in the debate on the original passage of the bill through the House urging its passage, and joined in the debate incident to the reception of the veto message itself. Remember, of course, that the Republicans had a slight majority in the House at that time, as I recollect; but the Democratic Party was a powerful minority group, many of whose members were exceedingly prominent in this and other debates and who contributed much to this discussion and its final solution which occurred a year later.

It is not for the purpose of drawing any comparisons or to bring before this committee at this time any partisan consideration that I call attention to the support given to this proposal by the prominent members of the Democratic side of the House at that time on the vote to override the President's veto of the Budget Act.

We find, for example, voting to override, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Bankhead, the present distinguished Speaker the House; the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Buchanan, the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House; the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Byrns, the late Speaker and former majority leader of the House. I may mention also the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Crisp; the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Huddleston; the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Jones; the present chairman of the Committee on Agriculture; the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Rayburn, the present majority leader of the House; the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. Taylor, who in the last session of Congress was the acting majority leader. I could name many others who, joining with representative Republicans, believed not only in the constitutionality of the bill but in the necessity for its enactment.

Mr. Chairman, this ended the matter in that Congress. In 1921 the agitation was resumed and carried on in much the same spirit as in 1920. In the meantime Mr. Wilson had retired from the Presidency and had been succeeded by Mr. Harding. Again there was a Republican majority in the Senate and in the House, although of not overwhelming dimensions by any means.

The bill was introduced all over again, and, as I recollect it, Mr. Good, of Iowa, had charge of it in the House. It came from the so-called Budget Committee, composed of both Republicans and Democrats. If my recollection is correct it came with a unanimous report.

As this bill passed the House, the Comptroller General was to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, removable by the Congress by a concurrent resolution in practically the same language as contained in the bill of 1920. The House still clung to the life tenure or to the proposition that the Comptroller General should serve until he was 70 years of age or during good behavior.

The Senate committee, headed by the late Senator Medill McCormick, of Illinois, believed that the Comptroller General should serve for 7 years. In other respects throughout the bill there were very, very few differences. The Senate passed the bill with an amendment changing the tenure of office of the Comptroller General.

The bill went to conference, and the conferees of the two Houses compromised and provided that the term of the Comptroller General should be 15 years, but that he should be ineligible for reappointment. The conference report submitted to the two Houses emphasizes the fact that by this device the Comptroller General would still be kept completely independent of executive control or influence. Being ineligible for reappointment, he cares not what any executive officer thinks of him; he cannot be moved by ambition to succeed himself, and, not being removable by an Executive order but only by the Congress, his responsibility to the Congress and his independence from executive control persists.

This bill came before the House in 1921 and the House had a very enlightening debate upon it; more so, perhaps, than upon the veto message of Mr. Wilson. Those who spoke included the Honorable John Nance Garner, of Texas, who insisted that the Comptroller General should be completely independent; Mr. Byrns, of Tennessee, who did the same; Mr. Bankhead, of Alabama, who did the same; Mr. Good, of Iowa, and many others.

So in 1921 there was no partisan division. The leaders on both sides saw the great necessity for establishing a Budget system in the Federal Government, and the further great necessity of establishing as an integral part of the Budget system an independent auditor responsible only to the Congress. The act was passed and was signed by President Harding. The roll call on final passage showed—yeas 335, nays 3. You can thus see the practical unanimity of the action of the Congress at that time.

Of course, I do not know how the present Members of the Congress feel about the passage of that act. I happened to be here at the time, as many of you were. I got the impression at that time—and I have had it ever since—that the passage of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 represented the greatest fiscal reform in the conduct of the Government of the United States since its foundation in 1789. I think for the first time it struck at a huge and admitted evil; that is, the wasteful expenditure of the people's money. For the first time it set up a system by which it would be possible for the Congress, as well as the public, to get a clear understanding, if they are willing to study the Budget figures, of the structure of the Government of the United States and the manner in which it spends its money.

Mr. Chairman, the Budget system has continued to the present day. The Comptroller General has performed his function. The first 15-year term has come to an end and the incumbent has left office, not being eligible for reappointment. At the moment an Assistant or Acting Comptroller General is performing the functions of that Office. It has fallen under criticism, and especially criticism from a committee of gentlemen appointed by the President of the United States, who, examining into the structure of our Government and looking toward a better management of the executive departments, have recommended the abolition of the office of Comptroller General and of the General Accounting Office. The President himself made that recommendation, his very own, in his message to the Congress relating to the reorganization of the executive departments.

I am not sure that every Member of the House will agree with me about this, and as I express my views I beg of you to believe I am not expressing them as a partisan, but, rather, as one endeavoring to view the future. Presidents come and go. Congresses come and go. But the bureaucracy goes on forever. We may feel perfectly safe with respect to the legal and proper expenditure of the funds which we appropriate under the guidance of the present occupant of the White House. We may feel perfectly safe with respect to the proper expenditure of the funds under the guidance of the next occupant of the White House. But who can tell in the mutations of politics, the swinging back and forth of public opinion in times of stress, confusion, and hysteria, what the future holds with respect to this great problem? And in the future what shall be the function, the standing, and the power of the legislative branch, and especially of the House of Representatives, in which, according to custom, all appropriation bills of major importance originate and in which, in accordance with the Constitution, all revenue measures must originate?

In 1921 the Congress, glancing toward the future, made up its mind that in the interest of economy and orderly progress it should have an agent of its own to audit the expenditures as made in this vast bureaucracy. To secure the assistance of such an auditor they created this office. They took care to make him absolutely independent of the officials whose expenditures he was to audit.

To my mind, there is a very, very deep and fundamental issue involved in this situation. It is involved not only to those who are concerned about the immediate present but to those who look along the vista of the future. It is proposed now that the office be abolished. It is proposed also that the General Accounting Office be abolished and that there be substituted, if it may be called a substitution, a general auditor, how independent of the several executive departments it is difficult to state, but completely dependent upon the Chief Executive; that he shall conduct what might be called a post-audit of expenditures made by the disbursing officers of this huge bureaucracy and make a later report to the Congress. He shall not be the agent of the Congress or its representative and shall not be responsible to it in any fashion whatsoever.

Criticisms have been cast at the Office of the Comptroller General, especially by this committee of three, who have charged that the interposition of his functions in what they are pleased to call the executive department of the Government has caused delay and confusion.

Perhaps you will bear with me if I attempt to give in a somewhat sketchy manner, and subject always to correction and elaboration by those who know more about it than I do, some description of just how this thing has been working.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Contrary to the conception entertained by a good many people, the Comptroller General and the Accounting Office today do not possess, as the result of the Budget Act of 1921, the absolute power of preaudit. Many people seem to think that before a disbursing officer of one of the executive departments can disburse money, he must get the audit or permission of the Comptroller General. That is not true. When the Congress makes an appropriation for a certain purpose, and the appropriation or the bill has been signed by the President, the department chief involved begins to study, or perhaps he has already studied, the method and program for spending the money for the purpose intended. Let us say he is the Secretary of Agriculture. When the Secretary of Agriculture has his plans made, he notifies the Treasury Department that the Department of Agriculture is ready to proceed under this appropriation. The Treasury looks up the appropriation and sets out on the books of the Treasury the item of appropriation to the credit of the disbursing officer of the Department of Agriculture; at the same time the General Accounting Office is notified of the readiness of the Secretary of Agriculture to proceed under the appropriation and that office also sets up upon its books this credit to the disbursing officer of the Department of Agriculture.

The disbursing officer of the Department of Agriculture, unless I am very much mistaken, is under bond, and he operates under what is known as a system of accountable warrants. If he disburses money illegally, under this accountable warrant system, he can be held responsible. His bondsmen may be called upon to reimburse the Government for the illegal expenditure and, of course, the system extends out into the field where local disbursing officers are established and they, too, may be held accountable.

With the Comptroller's Office in existence as it has been during the last 15 years, an overwhelming majority of the disbursing officers of the executive departments, and especially the good disbursing officers, have taken every possible means to ascertain in advance whether the disbursement they are about to make is legal under the act of the Congress which made the appropriation. So what do they do? They ask the Comptroller General to give them an opinion, and the Comptroller General examines the statutes, estimates the intent of the Congress, and then informs the disbursing officer that he may or may not disburse the money in the method suggested by the officer.

Of course, this has occasionally given rise to delay, but I want to impress upon you the fact that it has always been the result of the voluntary requests of the disbursing officers addressed to the General Accounting Office to find out whether they can disburse money in a certain fashion or not.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Also, as I understand it, the Comptroller General passes on the question of whether or not the appropriation was authorized by law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. The whole legality of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The whole legality of it is looked into. I think it is to the credit, largely, of the disbursing officers of the Government that they have gone to the Comptroller General to ascertain whether the disbursing of the moneys as planned by some bureau chief is in accordance with the law and the intent of the Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield again?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from New York made a statement a moment ago that puzzled me somewhat. The gentleman said that if one of these disbursing officers disbursed money that was not authorized by law, he could be sued on his bond and made to repay it. Does that apply where the Congress has passed an appropriation which was not authorized by law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot answer that question; I do not know.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think that in the original act there was an intent on the part of the Congress that there should be a preaudit?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There was not. There is nothing said in the original act about a preaudit.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York has stated that the Comptroller can pass on the question of whether or not Congress had the power to appropriate certain money or to pass the act. Has our Comptroller, in the 15 years, had occasion to turn down any act of Congress?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not sure that I understood the question of the gentleman from Mississippi. If that was the intent of the gentleman's question, I am, perhaps, in error. I think the Comptroller may not "go behind the returns" with reference to the passage of a bill.

Mr. RANKIN. I was under the impression that the Comptroller General, if we were to pass a law appropriating money for a purpose not authorized, had the right to pass on that disbursement. I may be in error about that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not competent at the moment to pass on that question.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York merely asked for information whether the Comptroller General ever turned down an act of Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. I thought the gentleman's question indicated his views in the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. May I ask the gentleman from New York whether it is his belief that the Comptroller General has functioned as a representative of the Congress rather than an independent agency? I understood the gentleman to say that the spirit and purpose of the original act was to have a representative of the Congress to pass on these bills. Has he actually functioned in that respect?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I believe so; yes. The Comptroller General in making these rulings upon the request of the disbursing officers has done so as an agent of Congress in protecting the funds. He certainly has not been an agent of the executive department.

The strength of his position is increased by the fact that he is completely independent of the executive department. He is not independent of Congress; he is our servant, our agent. We can remove him any time by concurrent resolution or impeach him.

I am not now saying that his performance has been 100-percent perfect. It has been a tremendous task, and he has had to move slowly because it was all new. In performing his functions he has protected the funds.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. And he has caused Congress to be more careful in passing upon appropriations not authorized by law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Many of us have been to the Post Office Department with reference to relief on contracts for star routes. It has been said that they could not do that although they were in sympathy with it because the Comptroller General said that it could not be done. If the Comptroller General were abolished, could not favoritism creep in there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I imagine from the nature of the question that the gentleman is in sympathy with me, and I think it would be a tragedy if the Comptroller General were abolished.

(The time of Mr. WADSWORTH having expired, he was given 5 minutes more.)

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have had this situation brought to my attention. In the purchase of marginal lands the legal department of the Department of Agriculture passes on the title and makes an abstract of title. I have had the complaint that after that was done it all had to be turned over to the legal division of the Accounting Office and again another examination involved which has resulted in much delay. I am wondering how much of that duplication exists.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot answer the gentleman but you will always hear complaints from the bureaus about delay. They cannot stand delay one moment in the spending of money.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will.

Mr. RANKIN. Notwithstanding all the complaints that have been made, with all the spending agencies we have and with the tendency to go beyond the intent of Congress, would it not be a deplorable situation if we were to abolish this position unless we had something to take its place? [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. Now, I must conclude in a few moments. Members of the Committee, it is now apparent, whether we like it or not, that the expenditures of the Government of the United States for many years to come will not fall below $7,000,000,000 a year. When this Budget and Accounting Act was passed in 1921, the annual expenses of the Government of the United States were three and one-half billion dollars, on an average.

Already we have doubled that sum, and it is apparent that, in accordance with the views of those now in power, there is to be no cessation, no substantial reduction in expenditures for years to come. Moreover, it is now apparent that the functions of the Federal Government, already multiplied most substantially through this depression, are not to be reduced in number. Many emergency departments or bureaus are to become permanent, if the recommendations of this reorganization committee prevail. The problem becomes more and more immense. A larger percentage of the people's money is being taken out of their pockets and brought to Washington in the form of taxes and then spent. Bureaucracy is growing by leaps and bounds, and when it grows by leaps and bounds and escapes auditing control, managed and governed by the legislative branch, then the legislative branch, just as sure as we are sitting here, becomes a rubber stamp. There is no other end to it.

If the Congress is to surrender its right to audit, through its representative, the expenditures of the money which it appropriates with certain purposes in view, then the Congress has lost once and for all its control of the purse strings. Gentlemen know as well as I do that Anglo-Saxon liberty has been built from the beginning upon the theory that unless the representatives of the people control the purse strings, liberty will not survive. I am not talking about 1936 or 1938 or 1940, if you please. We might get along for a while, but inevitably, in the long run, the legislative branch and especially this House of Representatives must lose caste, lose power, and become subservient, not I venture to say, to a single Chief Executive, but to a vast ever-growing bureaucracy, with its tentacles stretching out into every township in the land, clothed with power from time to time—at its own demand generally—to control the daily life of the citizen and to be free in the exercise of that power. The hope of control lies right here on this floor. The hope of the future in keeping our Government orderly, in conserving the wealth of the Nation, in seeing to it that we do not become abject subjects of a bureaucracy lies in maintaining in our system of government an auditor named by the Congress and responsible to the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

REPUBLICANS OBJECT TO NEW DEAL SPEECH BEING PUT IN RECORD

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to address these remarks also to the Republican side, because they are about the incident that occurred this morning when an address I wished to put into the RECORD was objected to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and another address offered at the same time was not objected to. I have talked to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, who says it is not in violation of any precedent, and he cannot understand why it was objected to.

This is an address by Robert H. Jackson—not the Jackson who is a member of the Democratic National Committee but an entirely different person, who holds probably the highest position in the Attorney General's Department. It is a speech which he delivered to the New York Bar Association, and I shall quote a little of what he said, so that the House can understand what I offer. I shall ask unanimous consent to put it in the RECORD because I believe I am not violating any precedent. It is an important speech that ought to be in the RECORD, far more important than the other speech that was not objected to.

The address by Mr. Jackson, and which was objected to, was delivered at the annual dinner of the New York bar held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on January 29. Speaking of the legal profession, he says:

The profession tonight can scarcely boast of its popularity.

Then, further, he says:

Why does the legalism that guides courts and bar so often find itself in conflict with the views of public leaders such as Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt; not to mention living leaders who have survived lawyer opposition?

SOME IMPORTANT WORDS SUPPRESSED APPEAR BELOW

Then further:

Other men are known by their fruits. We judge our work only by logic. Congress looks forward to results, the courts look back to precedents; the President sees wrong and remedies, the courts look for limitations and express powers.

The pattern requires the court to go forward by looking backward.

Legal philosophy requires us to consider modern labor relations in terms of precedents made by slave owners, and social security in the light of decisions by men who, if they heard the term, would have thought it means return of fugitive slaves. Our motto is, "No concessions to the times."

MEDICAL AND LEGAL PROFESSIONS COMPARED

Speaking further of lawyers and courts, he says:

Our record is one of fidelity to "fundamentals." Since 1787 the medical profession has changed its treatment of disease from blood letting to blood transfusion. We make no such disrespectful departures from the practice of the fathers.

We do not let the realities of life influence our legal decisions.

WE SHOULD HAVE "LIVING NATIONAL GOVERNMENT"—JACKSON

Again:

Our Constitution is a general outline of great powers and institutions. It is not a legal document.

It was never thought when they spared words in the interest of simplicity that we would reach a point where nothing is lawful unless the Constitution had a word for it.

They set up a living National Government and left the future to fill in much of detail, according to its own experience, its judgment, and its own patriotic purposes. Then the lawyers whittled at it with the rules applicable to private contracts until today you commence study of constitutional law, not with the document but with a long course in interpretation of interpretations.

Mr. Chairman, in presenting this I offer a speech which is very important, made by a high official in the Government of the United States. If he had been a Republican, I would not have objected; and I now ask unanimous consent, with this explanation, that his very able and instructive address be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that request is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak on the point of order. It seems that a great effort is being made to suppress this speech. Are the gentlemen afraid of the truth?

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that the request is not in order at this time.

NO OBJECTION TO WIND AND AIR, BUT A GREAT SPEECH, NO! NO! NO!

Mr. MAVERICK. This debate is not confined to the bill. This is general debate, and it is in order, as far as I know. Everything under the sun has been said here today. Because a speech intimates lawyers and courts are not sacred, should it be suppressed? The RECORD is full of many tiresome things. Why should not a good, informative, intelligent, and progressive speech by a high official be inserted?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair recognizes that there is no rule on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman again state his point of order?

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that it is not in order to make a unanimous-consent request for extension of remarks in Committee of the Whole House. That must be done in the House.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, while there is no rule in the book preventing requests of this kind being granted in the Committee of the Whole, the same as in the House, previous Speakers of the House have established a policy, to which the House has been asked to adhere, that no unanimous consent requests of this nature will be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

POLITICAL PURGATORY AND THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB

Mr. MAVERICK. Very well. I regret very much that I cannot print the whole speech. It seems that the objection is really made upon the ground that the speaker, Mr. Jackson, is a New Dealer, for in the speech to the bar association he said concerning himself:

As the New Dealer on your program, I suppose I represent the "lesser breeds without the law." At least we are so represented at some bar meetings.

And he adds:

It seemed last fall that the American Bar Association identified itself pretty thoroughly with Maine and Vermont. Some people think we need a bar association to represent the rest of the United States. Now that the Union League Club offers itself as a political purgatory for penitent Democrats, there is a chance that the bar will extend absolution to unrepentant ones, and may even bring its liberalism nearer to date than the 1912 "New Freedom" model.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that I can do about this objection. If it is objected to, I cannot put the whole speech in; but I must regard the objections made by the Members of the minority as being based upon their opposition to the views of a progressive man. In other words, by the use of the general power in the House of objection, an important speech is withheld from the RECORD in the same manner as Mr. Jackson said in this speech:

Lawyers have tied up many major problems of government in legal doubts.

Thus my hope to get this fine speech in the RECORD, just as the Government has attempted to enact progressive laws, has been prevented by a capricious objection.

RIGID AND UNYIELDING LEGAL PHILOSOPHY

Mr. Jackson says:

Government by litigation has destroyed effective enforcement of public policy. We were once nearly wrecked by the rigid and unyielding legal philosophy which in the Dred Scot decision outlawed the Missouri Compromise.

I regret very deeply that the minority is not willing for this great speech to be printed in the RECORD. I regret that they have kept Members of Congress and the American people from reading the full truth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LUCAS). The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. A request for inclusion of matters other than the remarks of the Member is not in order in the Committee of the Whole. The Chair suggests that the gentleman withhold his request until the Committee rises. He may then submit his request to the Speaker.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, under the present terms of title II of the National Housing Act the guaranty by the United States of debentures of the mutual mortgage insurance fund issued by the Federal Housing Administrator in exchange for properties foreclosed under insured mortgages expires as to all mortgages insured on or after July 1, 1937. Should the Congress at this session fail to adopt an amendment to the National Housing Act providing for a continuation of this guaranty, the social and economic consequences to the Nation as a whole would be so widespread and so unfortunate that I wish to place before this House, as briefly and as clearly as I may, the fundamental considerations which, in my opinion, render the enactment of legislation extending this guaranty a vital necessity.

When the National Housing Act establishing the Federal Housing Administration was passed in June 1934, conditions in the building trades bordered on desperation. Home construction in this country had fallen to a point far below the average of the preceding 10 years—less, in fact, than that for any year since the close of the World War. The Nation was approximately 2,000,000 homes short of minimum requirements, and, with a normal increase of at least half a million new homes a year necessary to meet current needs, the number of homes built in 1933 was only some 47,000. Mortgage money was frozen tight, and the year 1933 had seen the Federal Government forced to create the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for the purpose of applying some $3,000,000,000 toward breaking the vicious spiral of deflation, foreclosures, and forced sales which engulfed the real-estate and mortgage markets during the depression years, and which, in the absence of this drastic intervention by the Government, would undoubtedly have wiped out a substantial part of our home-mortgage values.

It was against this background that the National Housing Act was drawn, and the act may be described as no more than a statutory expression of the lessons of this very bitter experience in the field of real-estate and mortgage finance. Over and above the now generally recognized effectiveness with which this legislation has served to meet an immediate emergency by unfreezing mortgage funds, reviving construction activity, and creating employment, its paramount purpose was and is to reestablish on a sound and permanent basis the colossal home-mortgage debt of the country, exceeding $21,000,000,000 in aggregate amount, and thus to prevent the recurrence at any future time of the disaster which overtook the real-estate market in the years 1929 to 1933. To this disaster, as all disinterested observers now know, basic defects in our whole theory and practice of home-mortgage lending, investment, and finance, which are eliminated by title II of the National Housing Act, contributed materially.

In addition to the paramount purpose of the act which I have just stressed, there is, of course, the equally important and correlative purpose of making possible a maximum contribution on the part of private capital toward a solution of our whole national housing problem.

With the exception of the modernization credit-insurance program of title I, therefore, it is self-evident from its background and context that the National Housing Act was in no sense passed by the Congress as a temporary emergency measure from which the Government could afford to withdraw its interest and support as soon as general economic recovery was restored. The title of the act reads:

To encourage improvement in housing standards and conditions, to provide a system of mutual mortgage insurance, and for other purposes.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in the very nature of things the improvement of housing standards and conditions and, to that end, the development and application on an ever-widening scale of a system of mutual mortgage insurance that in the brief period of slightly more than 2 years has conclusively demonstrated both its present effectiveness and its future promise in terms of debt-free home ownership for the average American family of small means, may not be viewed as a transitory emergency effort by any democratic government aware of its responsibilities.

There is another fundamental and frequently unappreciated characteristic of title II of the National Housing Act, namely, that within the framework provided by the law itself and by the regulations issued thereunder by the Federal Housing Administrator the system of mutual mortgage insurance is from first to last one of private-capital operation. The Federal Housing Administration neither lends nor spends Government money under title II. It simply insures the principal of mortgage loans made by approved private-lending institutions in accordance with prescribed conditions. For the insurance protection afforded, an annual premium equal to one-half of 1 percent of the original principal amount of the mortgage insured is charged by the Federal Housing Administrator and paid into the mutual mortgage-insurance fund. In the event of default and foreclosure of an insured mortgage, the insurance is paid by the Federal Housing Administrator through the issuance to the mortgagee of debentures of the mutual mortgage insurance fund in exchange for the conveyance by the mortgagee to the Administrator of the foreclosed property.

In addition to the debentures, the mortgagee receives from the Administrator a certificate of claim representing a principal amount equal to foreclosure costs and all other out-of-pocket expenses properly incurred by the mortgagee in connection with the transaction. The certificate of claim is payable out of such proceeds as may ultimately be realized by the Administrator upon liquidation of the foreclosed property; and in the event that such proceeds are more than sufficient to discharge the certificate in full, any balance remaining is returned to the mortgagor. In one of the few cases of foreclosure of insured mortgages that have occurred to date, it is significant that within a few weeks after taking over the property the Administrator was able to dispose of it at a price which not only entailed no loss to the mutual mortgage insurance fund but also permitted immediate payment of the certificate of claim issued to the mortgagee with the debentures and the return to the mortgagor of a substantial cash equity.

Of a total of 151,758 mortgages accepted for insurance by the Federal Housing Administrator, in an aggregate amount of $609,044,017 as of December 31, 1936, only 12, involving a total principal amount of $50,331.65, have been foreclosed. It is, of course, too early to attempt to predict with even probable accuracy what the foreclosure rate under insured mortgages may be. Actual experience thus far, however, is at least deserving of consideration as a convincing indication that this rate will be substantially less than that contemplated by the loss ratio upon which the actuarial calculations of the adequacy of the mutual mortgage insurance fund were based. In any event, it may be stated with complete assurance that, short of a real-estate and mortgage collapse substantially more drastic than that of the last depression, there is little or no likelihood that the Treasury would be called upon to pay under a guaranty of the debentures of the fund.

Why, then, should not the present guaranty be allowed to lapse on the 1st of next July in accordance with the terms of the original act? The answer is brief and, to my mind, quite as obvious as it is conclusive. For psychological reasons alone, the presence of this guaranty is, and for some time will remain, the keystone of the entire National Housing Act structure. In any insurance enterprise it is elementary that the public confidence required for successful operation can be obtained only by a company of unquestioned solvency, possessing unimpaired capital in an amount reasonably commensurate with the total insurance liability incurred or to be incurred. In setting up the mutual mortgage insurance fund, the Congress, instead of capitalizing the fund outright in an amount commensurate with the $2,000,000,000 volume of business authorized, met this situation by the alternative method of providing a nominal capital of only $10,000,000, supported by a guaranty of the debentures of the fund, applicable to all such debentures which may be issued in exchange for any property foreclosed under a mortgage insured prior to July 1, 1937.

The building up of the mutual mortgage insurance fund through the collection of annual premiums is necessarily a slow process. The original $10,000,000 placed in the fund has already grown to more than $15,000,000, and at the rate at which the Federal Housing Administration is now doing business, an average monthly volume in excess of $40,000,000, it will approximate $20,000,000 by the end of the present fiscal year. Until the fund is in a position, however, to issue a financial statement demonstrating to approved lending institutions that its capital assets are beyond question sufficient to meet all its liabilities, it is only natural that these institutions will place their chief reliance upon the Government guaranty. Because of it, some 7,000 of them are now actively cooperating in the program and have made insured mortgage loans in an aggregate amount rapidly approaching the $600,000,000 mark. Of this amount, more than 70 percent has been made by State and National banks, institutions to which prior to the passage of the National Housing Act investment in long-term amortized home mortgage loans was a more or less unknown and practically impossible venture.

In large measure widespread participation of banking institutions in the insured mortgage program was facilitated by the recognition given in certain provisions of the National Banking Act of 1935 to the importance of the role which banks may properly play in the home mortgage financing field. As a result, through the National Housing Act, there has been directly opened up to the home mortgage market the immense reservoirs of funds embraced by our banking system, funds never before available for this type of financial activity and never more needed than at the present time.

It requires little insight, therefore, to appreciate the results which would necessarily flow from any restriction of the participation of banks in the insured mortgage program or from any impairment whatever of the confidence of mortgage lending institutions, generally, in the soundness and integrity of that program. That such impairment might follow from failure to extend the Government guaranty of debentures of the mutual mortgage insurance fund is no gratuitous assumption, for already banks and other lending institutions are refusing to close new construction loans under Federal Housing Administration commitments to insure because of fear that delays in construction may make it impossible to have the mortgages representing such loans endorsed for insurance before the expiration of the guaranty on July 1.

In addition to the withdrawal from the home mortgage field of the funds available through the banking system, with a consequent decline of new construction activity, as well as disruption of the orderly liquidation and refinancing of millions of dollars' worth of frozen properties now in process, there would also result a revival of all the abuses which in the past have made the home mortgage the bane of lending institutions in times of stress, and the bane of the individual home owner, or purchaser, at all times. It is a fact that cannot be disputed that today the relatively high percentage, amortized mortgage loan, eliminating the necessity for costly secondary financing, is available to the average citizen of this country only through the mutual mortgage insurance system provided by title II of the National Housing Act.

It is equally beyond dispute that the average family of America with an income of $3,000 or less must forego the possibility of achieving debt-free home ownership unless the long-term, single mortgage, representing up to 80 percent of the appraised value of the property, is made available to it on a sound and secure basis.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I therefore submit that the continuation of the present Government guaranty of the debentures of the mutual mortgage insurance fund under title II of the National Housing Act represents no more than the logical carrying out of the purpose of the Congress in originally enacting such guaranty and until such time as that purpose shall have been fulfilled in fact. The Congress will defeat its own ends if it allows this guaranty to expire. The sole issue presented by this question is simply whether the Congress is willing to deprive the American people of the proven benefits of the insured mortgage program, for the purely bookkeeping reason that there will thereby be eliminated from the books of the United States Treasury a contingent liability so remote that none can plausibly argue that it will ever become actual to any appreciable extent. I therefore urge upon the members of this House earnest consideration and prompt adoption of any measure which may come before us providing for the extension of such guaranty. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 12 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, about a year ago I called the attention of the House to a situation apparently prevailing in the radio field, and to the part played by the Federal Communications Commission in this connection. I urged at the time that a thoroughgoing investigation be made of the entire situation.

I rise at this time to renew that recommendation, in the light of evidence recently submitted to the Committee on Appropriations by the Communications Commission. I do so because, if I interpret the evidence correctly, there is, I think, a situation that merits serious consideration on the part of every Member on both sides of the aisle.

I think it was General Weaver, Mr. Chairman, who, half a century ago, in making a colorful campaign for the Presidency of the United States on the Populist ticket, proclaimed throughout the country that unless something was done about monopolies we should one day have a corporation chartered to control our air supply and pipe it to the consumers at so much per gallon.

The prediction at the time, no doubt, seemed somewhat extreme. I submit, however, that the testimony given your committee by the Federal Communications Commission indicates that today we are in sight of a virtual monopoly by the big broadcasting companies of the Nation, with all the possibilities with which we have been familiar in the past in other fields, for the capitalization of that monopoly into earnings and profits, to the detriment of the American people.

I further submit that the evidence indicates, in the absence of further explanation, that the Federal Communications Commission has failed to exercise the regulatory functions contemplated in this connection by the Federal Communications Act.

Under the Communications Act, as you appreciate, Congress undertook specifically to provide against the evils of monopoly. The act provided that no license should be issued for more than 3 years. As a matter of policy, that period, as you know, has been reduced to 6 months. Every licensee is required to apply for renewal every 6 months. Renewal is authorized by law only if proved to be in the public interest.

I call your attention particularly to sections 301 and 310 (b) of the act. Under section 301, the act specifically sets forth its purpose, among other things—

> To maintain the control of the United States over all channels of interstate and foreign radio transmission, and to provide for the use of such channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time, under licenses granted by Federal authority.

Under section 310 (b), it is provided that—

> The station license acquired, the frequencies used by the licensee, and the rights therein granted shall not be transferred, assigned, or in any manner voluntarily disposed of * * * unless the Commission shall, after securing full information, decide that said transfer is in the public interest and shall give its consent in writing.

It is perfectly clear, I think, that the Congress intended in this manner to guard against the evils of monopoly, as well as those inherent in trafficking in Federal licenses. Nevertheless, the record indicates that under policies pursued by the Communications Commission virtual monopoly is at hand, the renewal of licenses has become largely a perfunctory matter, and the transfer of licenses has been approved upon terms which, in the absence of further explanation, appear, to say the least, to be without justification.

The Big Three broadcasting companies, Columbia, National, and Mutual, have acquired so many broadcasting stations and licenses that today it appears that, to all intents and purposes, they control all of the 40 clear-channel franchises in the country as well as other highly desirable franchises and stations.

How nearly complete the control must be is suggested by a recent statement by a former member of the Radio Commission to the effect that the Big Three use in their stations some 97 percent of all the full time night broadcasting power authorized by the Communications Commission. I understand, moreover, that no independent full-time station is licensed to operate at night with a power of more than 1,000 watts in contrast to the 165 or more stations controlled or operated by the Big Three, many of which are said to have power of 50,000 watts, one of them having 500,000 watts.

Monopoly is always dangerous. Monopoly of the air—a great medium for public expression—is particularly dangerous. Monopoly in this instance appears to have been facilitated by the virtual assurance of the continued renewal of Federal licenses permitting the capitalizing of presumptive franchise rights just as long-term franchise rights were capitalized in other fields in days gone by.

The record indicates not only that the renewal of licenses has become largely a formality, it indicates also that the Commission has approved the transfer of licenses on terms which appear to be contrary to the public interest and to the intent of the law.

Let me call your attention to tables furnished by the Commission purporting to show a record of all transfers and leases of licenses approved by the Commission since its organization. You will find these tables on pages 370, 376, and 1038 of the committee hearings. Instance after instance appears where the Commission has given its approval to the transfer of a licensed broadcasting station for a consideration far in excess of the replacement cost of the station transferred. Other instances will be found where approval has been given to a transfer in the form of a lease for periods in excess of the original license. Time will not permit detailed analysis. Among other approved sales, however, you will find the following, the replacement value of the station transferred being given in each instance in the first column and consideration paid for the station in the second column:

Replacement value:	Consideration paid
$217,000	$1,250,000
$13,500	28,500
$14,000	65,000
$65,000	110,000
$14,000	50,000

You will also find among the leases referred to a lease of a station with a replacement value of less than $500,000 for an annual rental of $219,000 for a period of 7 years; a lease for a period of 10 years with an option of renewal for another 10 years; and in still another instance a lease of a station apparently for a period of 99 years. I am advised that the lessor in certain instances obtains under the terms of the lease not only a fixed rental but also a substantial percentage of the profits realized by the lessee.

Mr. Chairman, if the Federal Communications Commission is in position to justify these transactions, I hope it will do so. I know that it is unnecessary to emphasize the dangers inherent in trafficking in Federal licenses. The practice opens the door to all the scandals which we have known in the past in other fields.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

It opens up the door to scandals which the Communications Act was intended to eliminate. In the absence of further explanation it is difficult to believe that transfers approved by the Commission have been in the public interest and within the terms of the Communications Act.

The testimony of the Commission appears in the hearings before your committee. I call particular attention to the testimony beginning at page 367. I think it is fair to state that the testimony of those appearing before your committee prior to the submission of the figures referred to clearly indicates either a complete ignorance of facts which should have been within their knowledge or a desire to withhold those facts from your committee. As a matter of fact, the information embodied in the last table furnished, appearing at page 1038, is far from complete. There is reason to believe that a further scanning of the records of the Commission either by the Commission itself or by your committee would be helpful in furnishing additional light.

Mr. Chairman, the very existence of this industry depends upon the grant of a Federal franchise. Under existing policy this franchise is granted as a gratuity. Not a cent is paid by the licensee. The return to the industry as a result of the franchise has been enormous. I have seen the annual income for the past year estimated as amounting to over $100,000,000. In my judgment, the industry can and should, through license fees or otherwise, make a real contribution to the Federal Treasury.

A thoroughgoing investigation would serve to furnish the country with information as to the extent and effects of the monopoly. It would also determine whether the Communications Commission has or has not performed its duties under the Federal Communications Act. It would also serve to determine the charge which may fairly be imposed on the members of the broadcasting industry in return for the franchise granted as a gratuity, which, of course, belongs to the entire American people.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I renew the recommendation of a year ago for a thoroughgoing investigation.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. My colleague from Massachusetts has made a very interesting statement. I presume from his remarks he is in favor of a resolution which I have submitted calling for a thorough investigation of radio monopoly by a select committee of seven to be appointed by the Speaker of the House?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am very much in favor of the resolution. I remember that my colleague introduced a similar resolution a year ago having the same purpose in mind.

Mr. CONNERY. As I have stated, the gentleman has made some very interesting statements. Some of the facts he has given I did not know myself. But they only add to the reasons why a thorough investigation should be made by a select committee of this House.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I hope my colleague will succeed in securing the approval of the Rules Committee and having his resolution reported favorably to the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, I have a very important matter to discuss in connection with the pending bill. That is the increase in the number of mental cases under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Bureau and the shortage of beds in veterans' facilities throughout the country.

We have a surplus of beds today in all veterans' facilities, so far as general hospitalization is concerned. That is true so far as TB hospitals are concerned. But today on the waiting list of the Veterans' Bureau there are over 2,800 mental cases that have made application and are unable to get in. These are absolute, bona-fide applications made to the Veterans' Administration by men who should be able to get into these various hospitals. We have in addition to that a constant increase in mental cases over all other cases. In the last 2-year period the mental cases have increased 5 percent, while all other cases have increased only 2 percent.

Mr. Chairman, this condition exists in all States. You have a veteran who is a mental or nervous patient, and you try to get him into a State institution. Your State institutions are loaded and cannot keep pace with the increase in nonveteran cases in the various States, no matter how much they build. The State officials give as their excuse: "This is a veteran. He should be taken care of in a veterans' hospital." They pass the buck back to the Veterans' Administration. I do not know about the rest of the districts, but in certain districts in Indiana as a result we now have veterans in jail waiting because they cannot get hospitalization. The veterans' facility at Marion, Ind., which is the largest of the mental facilities in the United States, has a capacity of 1,500 beds, with every one filled. These beds have been filled for months and years. There are an average of 12 applicants every day that cannot be taken in. Besides there are approximately 12 applicants from the Dayton home that are supposed to be handled and cannot be handled. This makes an average load of 22 cases that cannot be handled in this facility.

Mr. Chairman, this situation exists all over the United States. It is not confined to the State of Indiana. I have some figures, and I want to give them accurately.

On January 1, 1937, we had 4,206 TB veterans. We had available 5,729 TB beds. There is a surplus of beds over patients of 1,523.

We had 12,447 general hospital patients and 15,039 beds, or a surplus of 2,592 beds.

In connection with the mental cases, we had 24,087 patients and 24,436 beds, but there was a waiting list of 2,847. If we added to that the number of 349 beds that they had available and unfilled from some cause, we would still have a shortage of beds for mental cases of 2,498.

In considering this shortage we must also consider that many of these mental hospitals were made over from old soldiers' homes. The buildings are old barracks. They are unfit for the proper handling of mental cases and cannot be used for this purpose unless the barracks are remodeled to take care of mental cases.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. There are two ways in which this condition can be relieved. Of course, the gentleman understands that the Veterans' Administration or the Board of Hospitalization has funds with which to make additions to these hospitals. One reason that the mental cases have overrun the supply of beds is that, in the first place, the conditions through which we have passed for the last 4 or 5 years seems to have had a depressing effect on humanity generally. I think it will be found that all mental institutions are crowded today. One of the ways in which we can relieve the Veterans' Administration is in connection with the congestion of these institutions with what we call misconduct cases.

Somebody back in 1920, in connection with the passage of the original veterans' laws, undertook for the first time in history to penalize what they called misconduct cases and to deny them compensation. Many of them were among the best soldiers we had. Many of them faced the firing lines, and the record shows that as a rule they did their duty. But they are denied compensation. Therefore, the only relief they can get of any kind is in these hospitals. That has caused a great many of these men to go to the hospitals who probably would not go there if Congress did what I think is its duty and repealed the present misconduct clause in the veterans' law. There is a bill pending before the Veterans' Committee, of which I am chairman, which has that for its purpose. I hope to get it through at this session of Congress, so that it may become law and relieve this strain to a great extent.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I agree with the gentleman in his statement in connection with these misconduct cases. If these men were taken care of outside it would relieve the congestion. I have always thought it was unfair because a man had some evidence of the so-called misconduct provisions to keep him out of compensation, even though he may have something else which entitled him to compensation or a pensionable status. The gentleman was in the service. Like Kipling, I do not believe any single man in the Army grows into a plaster saint and I do not believe he should be penalized.

Mr. RANKIN. I believe also a great many disabilities have been attributed to misconduct that should have been attributed to something else.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. And if the law is amended to that effect, it will greatly relieve this strain and, probably, relieve it entirely.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I may say, however, to the gentleman and the Members of the House, that until we do something of that sort and until this congestion is relieved, we should think about establishing proper facilities for the great increase in mental cases. We have almost 3,000 on the waiting list now and the number is increasing at the rate of 5 percent. Within the next 4 years we are going to need 6,000 additional beds if we figure it on this basis. Some one in some way looks after the man suffering with a general disability who can go to a general hospital, but these men cannot look after themselves. There are men with dead minds in living bodies who are in jails and in all kinds of institutions where they should not be with the buck being passed from the State government to the Veterans' Administration and the Veterans' Administration not having sufficient facilities to take care of them. I think the Congress should begin to think about the problem and get ready for the future.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from Indiana I think funds have been provided. I think the Board of Hospitalization has ample funds to make the necessary extensions now under the law we passed 2 years ago.

Mr. GRISWOLD. But I will say to the gentleman that they are not doing it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GRISWOLD. For instance, in this particular facility I am talking about at Marion, Ind., there was appropriated $425,000 in the last bill to build a new clinical building. They tell me that next May they will advertise for bids, which will mean the building will be completed in the next 2 or 3 years, maybe, and yet at this hospital every day there are 22 applicants who cannot get in. These are bona-fide applicants and nobody knows how many would make application if there was any opportunity for them to get in. With the increased load, before the time this building to take care of present needs is completed another building will be necessary.

Mr. RANKIN. May I suggest to the gentleman that he take this up with the Board of Hospitalization and see if they have not the funds to make these additions to this hospital. I think they have.

Mr. GRISWOLD. They may have the funds, but they are not using them, and in addition to that, there are many of these old barracks buildings at the old soldiers' homes not equipped to take care of mental cases. We must consider that in taking care of mental cases they need clinical facilities more than they do in a general hospital or in a TB hospital, for they have the mental condition added to the TB and general condition. They need mess facilities, refrigeration, and all those things, that I will admit make the mental hospital more expensive than the others in original cost of construction but not in its maintenance afterward.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman that we can appropriate the money and authorize its expenditure, but we have no power to make them carry out the program.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. Referring to the bill that the chairman of the Veterans' Committee just referred to, doing away with the misconduct clause, if that were passed at this session, would that lighten the load so that enough insane veterans could go into these hospitals without building additional hospitals?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I think that would relieve the load somewhat, but I could not say that it would relieve it sufficiently, because, according to the reports, on January 1, 2,800 more men were on the waiting list, and with this increase of 5 percent that the Veterans' Administration gives me, I do not know whether that would lighten the load sufficiently or not.

Mr. CONNERY. I am in favor of doing away with that misconduct clause; I can tell the gentleman that.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If the load in the mental cases is increasing faster than the general load, and we have a surplusage in one class of hospital and a shortage in the other, then simple arithmetic should teach us that we must increase the capacity for mental cases. The other type of cases seems to have reached the peak.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, with the independent offices appropriation bill before us, it is timely to give some consideration to the report of the Brownlow Commission and the President's message of January 12, based on that report, recommending the reorganization of the Federal Government. The report advises that all the independent offices be brought within the jurisdiction of the 12 executive departments.

No one will dispute—certainly no Member of Congress—that our governmental structure is top-heavy, unwieldy, inefficient, and wasteful. Despite the fact that the worst of the depression is past, that Happy Days Are Here Again is sung at every Democratic rally, and that the election is behind us, the Federal pay roll continues to grow. There are 143 separate governmental agencies with 840,000 regular paid employees, and the number is increasing at the rate of 100 daily. These and other equally shocking facts were revealed by the junior Senator from Virginia in a recent radio address.

We have too many legal staffs, too many lending agencies, too many construction offices, too many housing agencies, too many competing, conflicting, and overlapping commissions, bureaus, administrations, and authorities.

Let me give you a single example of bad management that has recently come to my attention. A farmer may borrow money to buy feed for his cow from the Farm Credit Administration, but if he wishes to borrow to feed his chickens he must go to the Resettlement Administration. Can anyone suggest any good reason why the same office should not handle both loans?

Clearly the time is at hand to tear down many of the temporary governmental structures which were badly planned and hastily erected in the last 4 years.

I believe, without having much information on the subject, that there are a number of older commissions that have outlived their usefulness. It is my guess that the various Mixed Claims Commissions, boundaries commissions, and fisheries commissions could be abolished tomorrow and their functions transferred to regular departments of the Government without a ripple on the sea of international relations. On the only occasion I ever had to visit one of the Mixed Claims Commissions no business whatever was being transacted.

There are certain recommendations in the Brownlow report and in the President's message which I regard as highly debatable. The most important of these is the proposal to give "the Executive complete responsibility for accounts and current transactions." That means abolishing the Office of Comptroller General and transferring his duties to some underling in the Treasury Department.

It seems to me that the wisdom of having an independent comptroller, free from political influence or Executive domination, has been convincingly demonstrated in the last 15 years. General McCarl has rendered distinguished service to his country; he has established lofty standards for his office and by a rigid insistence that the letter of the law be obeyed in the expenditure of public funds he has saved this country many millions of dollars.

I do not pretend to be an expert on government—only a humble student. In all the discussions of the "short ballot" for States or municipalities I have ever heard, experts have agreed that the legislative branch, the Chief Executive, and the one who succeeds him in case of death or disability, and the Comptroller should be elected by the people. The Secretary of State, Treasurer, and Attorney General, or those performing comparable services, may safely be appointive officers. The Legislature raises public funds and appropriates them for public purposes, the Executive spends them, and it is the function of the Comptroller to see to it that they are spent according to law.

Congress created the office of Comptroller General about 16 years ago and made a serious effort to free him from every influence that might interfere with the conscientious discharge of his duties. If he is to become a mere assistant or clerk in one of the executive departments, his usefulness will be impaired and the taxpayers will lose a valuable safeguard. It cannot be otherwise.

Another proposal which I think should be carefully weighed is the recommendation that the Interstate Commerce Commission be placed under the control of one of the Cabinet officers, presumably the Secretary of Commerce. In the 50 years of its existence the I. C. C. has steadily grown in prestige and usefulness. It has established itself as one of the most efficient of Government organizations and enjoys public confidence and respect. Its primary function is to protect the public from extortionate or unreasonable railroad rates and shippers from unjust rate discrimination, but we have steadily added fresh responsibilities. Only recently we have given the Commission jurisdiction over busses engaged in interstate commerce and have conferred new authority in connection with railroad reorganizations. I think the day is not far distant when it will have new duties in connection with transportation by air and by water. The Commission is essentially a quasi-judicial body. It is nonpartisan and bipartisan. If it is to maintain its character, the Commission must not be placed under the power of executive officers whether you call them statesmen or politicians.

I feel the same way about the Federal Trade Commission. It, too, is a quasi-judicial body, created originally to combat combinations in restraint of trade and unfair trade practices. The establishment of this Commission was one of the accomplishments of the Wilson administration in which he took the most pride. There was a time, not long since, when the Federal Trade Commission had few friends in this House. Its appropriations were cut down and threats were made to destroy it.

The Commission is now thoroughly established as a useful and necessary organization and plays an important part in the economic life of the country. It is destined to become a quasi-judicial court with still greater powers over the business activities of the United States if present indications mean anything. Last year the Patman-Robinson bill was passed, imposing upon the Federal Trade Commission the duty of preventing price discrimination. Since the demise of the unlamented and unwept N. R. A. the Commission has been busily breaking up combinations in restraint of trade which that legislative monstrosity brought into being. Bills are now pending to revive the N. R. A., or certain parts of it, through the instrumentality of the Federal Trade Commission.

It is equipped to conduct investigations and supply Congress with facts as a basis for legislation. And may I suggest the desirability of basing legislation on facts rather than the policy we have witnessed for the last few years of passing laws in a spirit of gay adventure and vague hope.

The last report of the Federal Trade Commission is worthy of careful reading, and I commend it to you. Since 1933 it has been engaged in 41 lawsuits and has been successful in 40 of them. Contrast that with the record of the Attorney General in his efforts to validate New Deal legislation. During the past year it handled nearly 2,000 cases of unfair competition and through conference, adjustment, and agreement settled nearly all of them without litigation. The offending parties have departed in peace, promising to sin no more.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The Federal Trade Commission has redeemed itself by its investigation of the holding companies.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Yes; it is now regarded as a valuable instrument of the Government.

Early in his administration the President attempted to destroy the bipartisan, nonpolitical, quasi-judicial character of the Commission by summarily removing Commissioner Humphreys from office. The Supreme Court held in a unanimous decision that the President had no such power, that the Commission was quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial, and a member thereof could only be removed for one of the reasons specified by Congress in the act creating the Commission.

I am not one of those who believe in the control of business by the Government or who denies that a certain amount of regulation is necessary. When abuses appear let us outlaw them, but initiative and competition should always be encouraged. That way lies progress. If courts or quasi-courts are set up to regulate or control the business of this country, I insist as strongly as I can that the men comprising those courts be independent of all Executive and political domination or restraint.

I do not wish to quarrel with the Committee on Appropriations, but it seems to me the funds provided for the I. C. C. and the Federal Trade Commission have not kept pace with the additional burdens placed upon these two bodies. If I were a member of that distinguished and powerful committee I would pursue a liberal policy toward agencies of government which Congress has created to perform essential functions, and I would be as niggardly and miserly as Silas Marner toward the experimental projects of the brain trusters. Hundreds of millions have been spent to no good purpose while regular establishments of the Government have been hampered in their work by lack of funds.

Before we adjourn sine die, some day next July or August, we will be called upon to consider an administration measure to reorganize the Government along the lines of the President's message of January 12. I cannot speak for the Republican Party, but I am reasonably sure that our puny little minority in this House will attempt to protect and preserve the independent status of the Comptroller General, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission in this and future administrations for the sake of good government. There are undoubtedly many Members on the other side of the aisle—the crowded side—who agree with us in principle. With our united strength perhaps we can succeed. The President now has the 840,000 Federal employees completely under his thumb; he has had thus far a pliant and subservient Congress. When the judicial bodies are under his control we will have the autocratic form of government against which our ancestors struggled for centuries, by whatever euphemism you describe it.

If the rumor is correct that 250 Members on the majority side have pledged themselves to come along like harmless little sheep whenever the leader crooks his little finger, or if the majority prefer to take orders rather than to exercise the intelligence and independent judgment with which they are endowed, then let us all go home—all except the Speaker and the floor leader. Everything can be passed by unanimous consent or by suspending the rules. There will be no one to object, to say "no", or to make a point of "no quorum." It will only be necessary to keep a clerical staff large enough to handle the mechanics of legislation. But let the Chaplain remain—that is most important—and may he pray for the country as he never prayed before. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

REPUBLICANS' POSITION ON SOCIAL SECURITY LAW

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 29, 1937, at page 548, there is a joint statement purporting to be an explanation by Senators VANDENBERG and TOWNSEND and Representatives REED and JENKINS. This statement criticizes the present social-security law and raises a question that I think there will be more discussion about in the next few months and years than about any other question before Congress. I am answering it as an individual Member of Congress. I have no right to speak for the administration or the Democratic Party, and I shall not attempt to do so here. The statement criticizes the present social-security law for two reasons; one, because it does not include farmers and domestic servants, but the principal criticism, obviously from the amount of the statement devoted to it, is because of the enormous reserve fund set up to provide old-age benefits. That law is justified for many reasons, but, if for no other reason, it is justified because of the reserve fund.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITY QUESTION WILL BE SOLVED

I have heard many persons criticize the issuance of tax-exempt securities. Members get on the floor of the House frequently and say they should not be issued. Many of us oppose the Government's paying interest on its own obligations. We feel that it is a bonus to those who purchase the Government obligations, because usually they are purchased with Government credit, and it is just the Government paying interest on its own obligations purchased through the use of its own credit. This reserve fund will eventually solve both of those questions and I shall tell you how it will solve them.

ALL GOVERNMENT BONDS TO BE OWNED BY THIS FUND

As the fund accumulates and it is increased each year by over half a billion dollars, eventually it will become a sufficient amount to absorb all United States Government bonds. It will bring them in from the banks. The banks are holding 60 percent of our Government obligations today.

Most of the banks have gone out of the banking business. The Government is keeping them up. They are speculating on Government bonds, and have become commercial bookkeepers. They are not in the banking business any more, because they have no incentive to be in that business. As the reserve fund increases and the money used in buying these bonds from the banks, the banks will have to use that money in the channels of trade and production or they will have no earning power. So there will be an incentive for the banks to go back into the banking business. The banks do not like that, they like it as it is, they want the Government to continue to pay them four to five hundred million dollars a year interest on the Government's own obligations, bought with the Government's credit. These obligations can be exchanged at any time for new United States currency through the Bureau of Engraving and Printing here in Washington, D. C.

BITTER FIGHT WILL BE WAGED

The banks like that, and they object to this reserve-fund arrangement and, mark my words, there will be a bitter fight to repeal that section of the law because eventually all these Government bonds will be owned by this reserve fund, and they will be deprived of the opportunity of receiving four hundred million or five hundred million dollars from the Government as they are now receiving annually. We will continue to pay interest on these Government obligations, it is true, but that interest will go to the old people of this country. It will not go to the banks, it will not go to the Government bondholders, but will go to the aged people of the country. We do not object to paying the interest for that purpose, which is perfectly all right, but the people who are benefited by the present arrangement do not like it. They want us to continue to have these bonds, 60 percent of them, in the banks and have us pay the banks four or five hundred million dollars a year interest, and then when we need more money for this reserve account, they think we should appropriate it directly from the Treasury of the United States.

STATEMENT SUGGESTS RESERVE ACCOUNT SHOULD BE SUBSIDIZED LATER SO GOVERNMENT BONDHOLDERS CAN BE SUBSIDIZED NOW AND IN FUTURE

I read to you now from this statement gotten up by the Republican leaders:

> We should not, however, hide the fact that the Federal Government is paying such a subsidy, and we should not finance old-age benefits in such a matter that the subsidy is more than is necessary for the purpose. * * * A Government subsidy bearing part of the cost of the plan will make any such pay-roll tax unnecessary. * * * The Federal Government can afford to pay such a subsidy, since it will not have to pay out of the general fund interest on the $47,000,000,000 old age benefit reserve account.

This statement says it is all right to pay the subsidy at a time when we need it, but we should not do it now; in another way saying, "We want the banks to continue to collect interest on these Government obligations and when we need the money for this fund that will be kept out and paid to the banks we can appropriate it out of the Treasury." That will be fine for the banks, but is it good business? Will it not amount to subsidizing the banks? The present law is the best way to handle it. In that way it solves our tax exempt securities question; it solves the question of the Government paying interest on its own obligations; but these Republican leaders say, "We do not want to do that. We want to continue to let the banks draw this enormous interest, and then when the time comes that we have to have more money for this reserve account, we want that money appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States."

ACCOUNT SHOULD REMAIN AS IT IS

I was hoping that this account would remain as it is. There has never been a man on the floor of this House who has spent more time talking against tax-exempt securities than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. He is anxious to solve this question. The best way to solve it is to keep this reserve account just as it is.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

DAILY BALANCE IN TREASURY

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman know why the Secretary of the Treasury is carrying in the banks $1,730,782,644.66 as of January 28 and paying the borrowers interest on this money?

Mr. PATMAN. Why does not the gentleman ask me a question about what I am talking about? Why does he want to get off the question? I do not blame the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman from Texas is attacking the Republican Party for doing something, and I should like to know why the Democratic Party is carrying this money in the banks today and paying this interest? That is their fault, too.

Mr. PATMAN. I will tell the gentleman what I believe to be one reason why, because the Treasury of the United States today can get money from banks cheaper than they can print the bills at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. They can get money as low as 10 cents for the use of $100 a year. Why should they not keep a large account in the banks on a basis like that?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman would not recommend their borrowing this money and paying interest to the banks, would he?

NOT A PENNY HAS BEEN STOLEN BY LEADERS OF THIS ADMINISTRATION, WHO HAVE DISPENSED BILLIONS OF DOLLARS

Mr. PATMAN. That is a question of policy. They are on the inside. They know why. They have a reason for it. Evidently it is a good reason, or they would not do it.

One thing can be said for this administration; with all the billions of dollars that have been spent, that we know about, you cannot trace one penny that has been dishonestly spent by those in charge, not one penny has been embezzled. With an administration having a record like that, the gentleman certainly would not want to accuse them, without any reason on earth, for keeping a large balance when he thinks they should keep a small one.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman allow me to reply to that?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield for a question briefly.

Mr. RICH. When Mr. McCarl last year refused to pay $800,000,000 that was spent illegally by this administration, where they had bonded men as paymasters, they came in here with a bill asking that this be approved by the Comptroller General. Will the gentleman tell me why they wanted to come here and do that if it was not illegally spent?

Mr. PATMAN. Ordinarily the gentleman would like to talk about tax-exempt securities. I am now talking about tax-exempt securities, and the gentleman does not want to talk about them at this time.

Mr. RICH. I am against the issuance of tax-exempt securities.

REPUBLICANS PURSUING SAME POLICY

Mr. PATMAN. Because the Republican Party is pursuing a policy of protecting the big interests of this country just as they always have. Right now the Republican Party has become the mouthpiece for the big bankers. The big bankers are squawking about this reserve account. They do not like it. I am surprised that the leaders of the Republican Party in the Senate and in the House would give out a statement denouncing this reserve fund. Of course it is couched in language that would not be discovered very quickly unless you knew something about the history of the social-security law; but, knowing the history and the purposes of the law, we can take the veil off of this statement, and, after we remove the veil, we see it is nothing more in effect than the Republican leaders becoming the mouthpiece for the big Wall Street bankers.

SOLVES TAX EXEMPT SECURITY QUESTION AND ANOTHER MAJOR CONTROVERSIAL QUESTION

I hope they change their tactics and change their policy, because this account is serving two good purposes. As I said, first, it solves the tax exempt security question that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is always talking about when somebody else is talking about something else, because no one objects to paying interest on tax-exempt securities that are in an account owned by the old people, and the interest will go to the old people of this Nation. No one objects to paying that interest. No one objects because they are not taxable. So that solves two issues. Solving the two issues, I am really surprised that the Republican leaders would get themselves into such a trap as this in such a short length of time after an election wherein the expressions of the people were overwhelmingly in favor of the plain people instead of the Wall Street banks.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I will yield to the gentleman if he does not try to change the subject.

WE ALREADY HAVE A LAW TO ELIMINATE TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman, or some Member on his side of the House, bring in a bill eliminating future issuance of tax-exempt securities? The gentleman will find that such a bill will have hearty support over here.

Mr. PATMAN. We have such a law. A bill is not needed. It is the law right now; it is the law I am talking about. We are doing away with tax-exempt securities just as rapidly as we can accumulate this fund. The gentleman is trying to destroy the law that will do what he always said he wanted to do. I understand the gentleman is in favor of this statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is turning a back-somersault right there because he always was against the issuance of tax-exempt securities. So am I.

Mr. PATMAN. I am asking the gentleman if he is in accord with these statements that have been expressed by the Republican leaders? Answer yes or no.

Mr. RICH. I am in favor of stopping the issuance of tax-exempt securities and I will support any legislation to that end.

Mr. PATMAN. I know the gentleman makes that statement, and I feel sure he is sincere about it, but if he really wants to stop them it occurs to me he should be supporting this law, because it is in the direction of doing away with tax-exempt securities.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not want the gentleman to make a statement unless he can prove it in some degree. The gentleman has said that the large banks have approached Republican leaders——

Mr. PATMAN. I did not say that the large banks had approached the Republican leaders. I am not attacking the gentleman who made this statement, personally. It is not personal. There is a difference of opinion. I do not agree with them. I am giving my opinions and connecting their views up with the Republican Party because they are leaders of that party.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman made a direct statement to that effect.

Mr. PATMAN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman can get the stenographer's minutes. They will show that I did not make that statement. I certainly did not have any such intention on my mind. My remarks are not intended as a personal attack on anyone.

Mr. GIFFORD. That was the gentleman's assertion.

Mr. PATMAN. I said that I was surprised at the Republican leaders becoming a mouthpiece for the big international and Wall Street bankers; and I am—that they should become their mouthpiece within such a short time after election. After 6 months or a year I would not be surprised, but within a few months I am surprised that they would openly come out and advocate what the New York bankers want which was opposed by the administration.

Mr. GIFFORD. Had the gentleman made that statement I would not have interrupted him, had he said he was surprised; but he said the Republican leaders were approached by the big bankers.

Mr. PATMAN. I am quite sure the gentleman is mistaken. I know the gentleman must be embarrassed about the statement made by those leaders of the Republican Party.

Mr. GIFFORD. No; I am embarrassed for the gentleman, because I might ask him to prove his statement. His surprise——

Mr. PATMAN. I was quite surprised.

Mr. GIFFORD. His surprise was one of these ingenious expressions we have heard of before.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to ask me a question, I will try to answer it.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ask the gentleman to prove his statement.

Mr. PATMAN. I made the statement that I am surprised that the Republican leaders in such a short time after the election would come in here and openly become the mouthpiece of the Wall Street interests; and I am; they have become the mouthpiece of the Wall Street interests.

Mr. GIFFORD. Now the gentleman changes his statement.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman agree with the statement; yes or no?

Mr. GIFFORD. I disagree. I feel sure no big banker has approached any Republican; no, sir.

Mr. PATMAN. I am not claiming that big bankers approached them. I am telling the effect of the statement. Will the gentleman first answer yes or no? Does he agree with that or not?

Mr. GIFFORD. With the gentleman's original statement I disagree, and I challenge it.

Mr. PATMAN. It was put in the RECORD—Senator VANDENBERG and Senator TOWNSEND in the Senate and the gentleman from New York, Mr. REED, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. JENKINS, in the House.

Mr. GIFFORD. If that is the statement to which the gentleman refers, I agree with that.

Mr. PATMAN. I merely stated that I was surprised that these gentlemen would permit themselves to be used for that purpose, that is to help New York bankers get this reserve account changed so that we shall continue to have tax-exempt securities in the future. I am not claiming that big bankers came to see them and got them to do it, but I am saying that the effect of what they have done is to cause the Republican Party to continue as the mouthpiece of big bankers. If the gentleman is in favor of that he is in favor of continuing tax-exempt securities. We have a law on the statute books—the social security law—that will wipe them out and bring about this change. The gentleman seems to think I am making a personal attack on members of his party including himself and the four gentlemen who made the statements. He is mistaken. I am merely disclosing the effect of their advocacy of the repeal of this reserve-account provision.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will answer the gentleman later.

Mr. PATMAN. And the members of the Republican Party are trying to break down that law; trying to get the part repealed that will solve the tax exempt security question and permit all interest paid by the Government on its obligations to go to the old people instead of the banks.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. How long will it take before tax-exempt securities now issued will be absorbed through operation of the reserve fund?

Mr. PATMAN. About 10 or 15 years, depending on how quickly the fund is increased and how quickly the national debt is reduced.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will it not take longer than that?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know how long it will take.

I am in favor of so amending the law as to permit securities of States and local political subdivisions to be included after the Government securities are absorbed, that the States and the political subdivisions may have the advantage of a lower rate of interest, that the interest may go to the old people of the country instead of to a few bankers and Government-bond holders.

Mr. BOILEAU. This fund is very slow in accumulating.

Mr. PATMAN. If the gentleman wants to advance it I will be with him, and if it can be safely done I am perfectly willing to advance the fund so as to absorb it more quickly, if practicable and feasible, but I am not in favor of its repeal.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman permit me to make one additional observation? I believe we should at the earliest possible date discontinue the policy of issuing tax-exempt securities.

Mr. PATMAN. This will do it.

Mr. BOILEAU. But at a slow pace.

Mr. PATMAN. We could retire the national debt more rapidly but that would cause an increase in taxes. That would be one way to do it. This is the first time in the history of this Government a step has been taken in the direction of stopping these two evils. One is tax-exempt securities, and the other is the Government paying interest on its own obligations to banks and to private individuals. It is a step in the direction of stopping that practice, and now the Republican leadership wants to change the law which provides for the stopping of these evils.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is a question purely for information. Does the gentleman recall when the social security bill was discussed on the floor of this House the point was ever raised that the cumulative fund was to be used for the purpose of liquidating the outstanding Government debt and reposing it in the reserve account?

Mr. PATMAN. It was considered by me when I was before the committee. I thought it was one of the most important things in the bill. Although I opposed certain features of the bill I was willing to support it in every way because of this feature. It is just as important as social security itself.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman say there was any general discussion which centered around that part of the bill?

Mr. PATMAN. I was not here all the time, so I cannot say. I have not informed myself.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As a matter of opinion and as a matter of information, would the gentleman say it was the opinion and the conception of the Members of the House at that time that this reserve account was going to be used for the purpose ultimately of impounding all of the funded Government debt?

Mr. PATMAN. That was my information at that time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would the gentleman say that was the general impression?

Mr. PATMAN. I believe other Members had it in mind. But what difference does it make? If it is a good thing, is not the gentleman for it now just as much as if he had it in mind when the bill was passed? Is the gentleman in favor of this or is he against it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know as I am in favor of it or against it. I have not paid any attention.

Mr. PATMAN. Has the gentleman read this statement of the Republican leaders?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I know nothing about it.

Mr. PATMAN. Has the gentleman read it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No.

Mr. PATMAN. Is not the gentleman in favor of paying the interest to the old people of the country instead of paying it to bankers?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If this is a good thing for the country, I am for it.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman think it is good for the country?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will come to that after I go into the matter. But may I bring one thing to the gentleman's attention? He will remember in the language of the social security bill there was a paragraph providing that the provisions of the Second Liberty Loan Act be amended.

Mr. PATMAN. To permit $14,000,000,000 more to be issued.

Mr. DIRKSEN. To permit the issuance of general Government obligations. It was such involved language that without the rest of the Liberty Loan Act being quoted I fancy most of the Members of the House were under a misapprehension.

Mr. PATMAN. I understood it and the gentleman understood it. I do not suppose anyone was fooled.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If it had been the general conception of the membership of this House that is what they were going to do with the general reserve account, there would have been more discussion than there was at that time.

Mr. PATMAN. That was amended for the reason if it became necessary to issue more bonds the bonds could be issued. Of course, the Treasury cannot issue bonds unless permitted to do so. Under the Second Liberty Loan Act there was a limit placed on the amount of bonds to be issued.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I make the observation that if all of the Second Liberty Loan Act had been brought to the attention of the membership of the House, and it had not been necessary to go back and dig it out of the files so that they knew what they were doing and knew there might be a refinancing of the whole funded debt of this Government through this reserve account, it would have made a tremendous difference in the attitude of the Members of this House.

Mr. PATMAN. I think the Members of this House, just like the gentleman, understood it, and as I understood it. We understood it, so certainly the other Members understood it. We were not on the committee and we understood it; therefore the other Members understood it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Under the provisions of this reserve fund, there is provided a guaranteed interest?

Mr. PATMAN. Of 3 percent.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is only natural to assume that the best investment would be Government bonds?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMACK. So without regard to whether it was expressly understood or not expressly understood, one follows the other.

Mr. PATMAN. It is written into the law. The gentleman should read it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I read it.

Mr. PATMAN. It says first, Government obligations shall be purchased for the fund. That is, direct obligations of the Government. Next, obligations that are guaranteed by the Government may be purchased. Next, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue obligations bearing 3-percent interest to go into that fund. No one has been fooled. So I ask that this reserve account be kept intact, no consideration given to the proposal to repeal it.

IMPORTANT ISSUE

Remember, every effort will be made by those adversely affected to get the reserve-account provision repealed. It must not be repealed. It must remain as it is so all interest paid by the Government on its obligations will go to our old people instead of Government-bond holders.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are taking up the first regular appropriation bill during this session of the Congress, which involves appropriations for the independent offices. I call attention of the Members of the House to the fact that we as Members of this House are responsible for the expenditure of the money of the American people. Our responsibility is so great that we as individual Members should assume our share of responsibility.

May I call your attention to the appropriations for this department of Government in 1936? The appropriation for the year 1936 was $805,234,158. The amount appropriated last year for 1937, according to the report, was $879,743,905, or last year, for the independent offices, we increased the amount $74,509,747 over 1936.

Last year we cut from the Budget estimate an amount equal to $47,601,861.

I want to call your attention to what we are doing this year. We now have the pending bill before us, and I may state that the amount we appropriated for the independent offices last year, plus the amount we gave these various agencies in the deficiency bill, amounted to over $1,079,000,000, or $266,000,000 more than the amount asked for in 1936.

Let us see what we are doing this year. The Budget estimate was $1,146,263,000. The appropriations we are making now amount to $1,140,313,398, or we are increasing the amount this year over last year's appropriation by $61,265,982. The committee only cut down the Budget estimate $5,950,000, according to the report of the committee itself.

The chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations made the statement on the floor of the House a year ago, "Budget estimates are one thing and what we appropriate is another." I have a high regard for the chairman of the subcommittee, but I would like to know why they did not cut at least $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 from the Budget estimates this year. This is the question that is in my mind, and this is not all.

I venture the prediction to the Members of the House of Representatives that every appropriation bill that will come before the House this year will be greater in amount than it was a year ago.

What is going to be the result if this is the case? Every one of these appropriation bills are coming in larger and larger, and whose responsibility is it? It is your responsibility and my responsibility. I want to tell the Members of the House that someone must assume the responsibility to cut down Government overhead. Who must assume it? The majority leader, the majority party.

We have heard this afternoon, and we will hear it almost every day, statements made about a reorganization of the Government. No one made a more earnest statement about cutting down Government overhead than the present President of the United States in 1932, when he was running for President. The Democratic platform called for a reduction in the number of Government bureaus and a consolidation of bureaus and departments, but what has been the result? Never in the history of this Nation have we established more bureaus or increased the personnel of the Government in peacetime more than we have during the last 4 years. Now, it is the responsibility of the majority leader of the House of Representatives, and through him the various appropriating committees, and through him the various other committees of the House of Representatives who are in control of the expenditures. He should demand that they come in here with reduced appropriations. It should not only be a request, but a demand, and every Member of the House of Representatives ought to feel that it is his responsibility to carry this out and reduce unnecessary expense, consolidate and abolish many of these Government agencies where they overlap and where they duplicate the work of administering.

After the first of November we heard the statement made by the President that we are increasing so rapidly our Government earnings that we will soon approach a balanced Budget by increased tax receipts. Never in this world will the increased revenue on account of the business increase of this country approach the rapid expenditures that are being made by the House of Representatives and Senate in their appropriation bills. Never will they catch up to each other. If that is the only way we are going to balance our Budget, then it will never be balanced.

If you want to get a balanced Budget, you have got to cut down expenses. You have now over 800,000 employees on the Government pay roll. You have increased this number by leaps and bounds, and the number is increasing every day.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. CURLEY. Does the gentleman know that in 1933, or during the last year of the previous Republican administration, there was a deficit of $3,680,000,000 handed to the incoming Democratic administration?

Mr. RICH. There was a $3,500,000,000 deficit in 4 years, but there has not been a year during the last 4 years of this administration when you have not exceeded that amount of deficit on the average every year. I deplore that fact in each instance—it is nothing to be proud of. So if you wish to harp on the 4 years of Republican administration, the average for each of the last 4 years of the Democratic administration has increased the deficit more than the amount the gentleman has just stated on the average for each year—a fact to be deplored.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield any more, because I have so little time. If the gentleman can get me an extension of my time, I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. CURLEY. I simply wanted to remind the gentleman that for 3 long years during that administration we had a deficit all the way through.

Mr. RICH. Yes; they were 3 long years of deficit, but we have had a deficit each year since those 3 years, and each one has been larger and larger, and each year we have gone into the hole deeper and deeper, and each year the way you are going now you will continue to go deeper and deeper into the red than any 3 years of Republican history.

Let me show you just what you are doing today, and I am quoting from the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, is responsible for making up these statements. I am going back to November 1936. I will take November 3. You will recall that a week or so after election the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate says we are approaching the balancing of the Budget.

If I do not do another thing this session of Congress I am going to call attention to the daily statement of the Treasury of the United States and let you judge for yourselves what will happen. It is an easy thing for a fellow to come in here at the end of the session and say we went in the hole three billion and a half dollars or $4,000,000,000. No one knows or realizes what it means. It seems to me that in that way you do not get anywhere and I am goin to try another attack and get the statements to you each day and see if that will do any good. See if it will soak in, as it were.

Now, go back to November 3, 1936. We went in the red $25,779,217.

On November 4 the loss to the Federal Treasury between receipts and expenditures was $22,045,300.

On November 5 the loss between receipts and expenditures was $19,254,770.

November 6 the difference between expenditures and receipts was a loss to the Government of $30,562,778.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does the gentleman notice how low it was on election day? [Laughter.]

Mr. RICH. Yes; on election day, that was November 3, the loss was $25,779,217. What is there funny about that? It was a Democratic day, and that to me was funny. But it will not always be that way.

Now let us get back to November 7 last. The loss to the United States between receipts and expenditures was $26,854,163.

On November 9 the difference between receipts and expenditures was a loss to the Government of $27,741,228.

Do you gentlemen ever read the statements that come before you? How many of you gentlemen read them every day? Not one. Too bad. Too bad. No wonder you do not take this serious.

Now take November 10. The loss to the Government on that day was $14,991,190.

On November 11 the loss on that day was $12,044,614.

It would seem foolish for me to read these statements; but, since nobody in the House reads them except myself, it seems that it is my duty to call your attention to them, and that is why I am taking this time. It may bear fruit.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I was interested in the loss on election day. Will the gentleman kindly repeat it?

Mr. RICH. It was over $25,000,000.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is in dollars. Was there any other loss on election day not enumerated in the Treasury report?

Mr. RICH. I think when we summarize the thing that happened on election day, 1936, matters will appear in a different light. Someone said to me the other day that 25,000,000 people cannot be wrong. My reply to that was that 25,000,000 people can wreck 125,000,000 people; and when you take account of the stewardship of this administration 4 years hence you will find then and there that the American people had a great loss on November 3, 1936. They will remember it as a sad, sad day. Let me go back here and show you what happened on November 12. There is one day you ought to laugh about. We were only $1,323,296 in the red. November 13 we were $5,594,476 in the hole, and on November 14, $9,145,068. Gradually coming up again, you see, to greater disaster. November 16, $30,515,148 in the red. It ought to cause a sense of shame to come over your faces.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman want a little more time?

Mr. RICH. I think the gentleman better give me more time now because it will save that much time later on, because if nothing happens I hope I can give you these reports daily.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. RICH. I want you to realize just what you are doing. On November 17 we were $9,517,962 in the red, and on November 18, $12,919,600 in the red; on November 19, $13,144,010 in the red. You people like red so well I think we ought to get some other color. On November 20, the loss was $16,919,545. I wonder whether there is any member of the Democratic Party here who reads the financial section every day in the newspapers and looks at the statement of the Treasury. You would get some of these figures if you would read the daily papers and then you would see how bad off we are becoming. On November 23, the loss was $13,123,266, and on November 24, $18,548,351. Perhaps some of you do not believe that I am giving you the right figures, and I had better pass a few of these out which I now do and if I am in error you gentlemen can correct me. Now, we will take November 25 and there we had a loss of less than one million, only $985,863.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is the gentleman going to put all of these figures in the RECORD?

Mr. RICH. I think it would be wise to let the Members see what is happening to the Federal Treasury and that their responsibility is to stop it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I was going to make the suggestion to the gentleman that perhaps the RECORD tomorrow ought to be printed in red ink.

Mr. RICH. That would probably be a good thing, and I think it will be if I continue to read the daily statements; they are practically all in the red. I hate to take the time of the Committee, but I think it is so important that it ought to be done, in view of the fact that the genial chairman of the subcommittee made the statement that Budget estimates are one thing and what we appropriate is another. What I want to drive home is I want you to stop these large appropriations. The chairman of this committee can cut this independent offices appropriation bill down 10 percent and no function of the Government will suffer. On the 27th of November the loss was $721,259 and on November 28th, $612,580. You are getting down nearer to my figures when you get down to less than a million dollars. I can comprehend what it is, but when you get up into the millions and the billions I do not think I know what you are talking about, and I am not sure that a majority of the fellows here know what they are talking about, and I think we ought to have an investigating committee to try to stop some of these Government expenditures. November 30 the loss was $16,538,174. Next is December 1—and we are going to get up to Christmas after a while—the loss was $3,220,325.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman is getting into December now, when the days are getting shorter, and it is noticeable that the loss is less.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman will find out when we get to January that it keeps going up again. Here is one for January 28, $7,271,758 in the red; January 25, $8,158,783 in the red. I shall keep you up to date right along; do not worry about that; and one thing I want to know is that very question that I kept asking last year day after day, Where are you going to get the money?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes. I will yield for any question that will help solve the problem of cutting Government expenses.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am very much impressed with the necessity of this Congress sooner or later turning its attention to the very thing the gentleman has been talking about.

Mr. RICH. I feel confident the gentleman from Indiana is of that spirit and temperament. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has again expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4064, the independent offices appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on Abraham Lincoln and include therein two short quotations, one from Franklin K. Lane and the other from Robert Lincoln O'Brien.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made today and to include therein very brief excerpts from an article which I quoted and one or two other pertinent articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the majority leader has informed me there is not any special business to be considered on Calendar Wednesday this week, but I want to say I am opposed to the general proposition of doing away with Calendar Wednesday. I think there are many pieces of legislation from some of our smaller committees that can much better be considered at that time than by unanimous consent. Today I objected to consideration by unanimous consent of two bills from the Committee on Immigration. I think controversial matters of that character and of quite far-reaching character should be given reasonable consideration on the floor. The only way it can be done is by maintaining Calendar Wednesday.

I shall not object at this time if it is the desire of the majority leader to dispense with it this week.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I quite agree with the gentleman from New York that when we get into the session and get reports from the various committees, Calendar Wednesday should not be dispensed with. I am as much in favor of protecting Calendar Wednesday as anyone, but there are many committees which have no reports at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SPENCE (at the request of Mr. MAY), on account of illness.

To Mr. SCOTT, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana (at the request of Mr. CLARK of Idaho), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania (at the request of Mr. HAINES), for 2 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. MILLARD (at the request of Mr. HANCOCK of New York), on account of illness.

To Mr. MAAS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

INVESTIGATION PERTAINING TO GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION

Mr. NEELY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 76), which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolved, That it is necessary, in aid of legislation by the Congress and for the use of governmental agencies, for the information of the general public, and for other purposes in the public interest, that accurate and comprehensive information be procured and compiled regarding the General Motors Corporation, and all other persons, firms, or corporations which control, influence, or direct the activities or policies of the General Motors Corporation, or whose activities or policies are controlled, influenced, or directed by the General Motors Corporation.

SEC. 2. The special Senate committee created by Senate Resolution No. 165, agreed to July 11, 1935, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate on the following matters with respect to the General Motors Corporation, including all its subsidiary, affiliated, and associated companies, and all other persons or companies in which the General Motors Corporation or any of its subsidiary, affiliated, or associated companies have any direct or indirect financial or other interest, or which have any such interest in them, or in which any of the officers or directors of the General Motors Corporation or any of its subsidiary, affiliated, or associated companies hold any office or exert any control, or whose officers or directors hold any office or exert any control in them.

(a) The corporate and financial history and the capital structure and the relationship of all such companies, including:

(1) The determination of whether or not such structure may enable them to evade State or Federal regulation or taxation, or to conceal, pyramid, or absorb profits, or to do any other act contrary to the public interest.

(2) The capitalization and assets of such companies and the means and sources of the growth of such capitalization and assets,

(3) The investment costs, profits, and rates of return of such companies,

(4) The salaries, bonuses, or other compensations of the directors, officials, and employees of such companies, and the extent to which the directors, officers, and employees, receiving such compensation, paid income taxes thereon, and

(5) The extent to which the financial gains of such companies arising from mechanization, improved technology, patents, unearned increments in land and other values, and increased productive efficiency of employees, which should have been made available in the form of lower prices to consumers or increased wages and salaries to employees, have been capitalized through stock dividends or other devices, or have been improperly diverted by those in control of such companies;

(b) The extent of centralization of control and of monopoly, and the effect of monopolistic control, if any, upon the reasonableness of prices charged by such companies for their products, and the desirability of legislative or other control for the public interest;

(c) The effect of mergers, consolidations, and acquisitions of control by such companies, including the determination of whether there has been any "write-up" in the purchase price of property, equipment, or intangibles, the fairness of the terms and conditions of any merger, consolidation, or acquisition, and the public interest therein, and the effect thereof upon prices or service;

(d) Whether or not the companies have sought through propaganda or the expenditure of money or the control of channels of publicity, or otherwise, to influence or control public opinion, legislation, administrative action, or elections;

(e) The extent of the accelerated and increased production on the part of the companies through "speed-up" methods, and the effect of such practices upon the physical health and mind of the employees of such companies;

(f) The dangers inherent in the absolute and unregulated control of the activities and policies of such a large industrial enterprise as the General Motors Corporation and such other companies by a small group of stockholders and bankers who hold no position in the companies which would impose upon them an obligation to the employees, the stockholders, and the public, and the extent to which such absentee control, without the obligation of responsibility, results in activities and policies of such companies contrary to the interests of the stockholders, employees, and the public; and

(g) The extent to which the activities and policies of the General Motors Corporation or such other companies are influenced, directed, or controlled by foreign interests to the detriment of the employees and stockholders of the General Motors Corporation and of such companies and the public.

SEC. 3. The committee is further directed, after analyzing and appraising the financial situation and the industrial productivity of the General Motors Corporation and its related companies as a typical unit of a mass production industry, to report, among other things, its conclusions and recommendations as to whether, after making allowance for adequate returns for capital actually invested in such companies, it would be practicable for the General Motors Corporation and its related companies:

(a) To institute a 30-hour week for all of its wage and salary workers; and

(b) To establish for the lowest grade of workers a minimum living wage in accordance with accepted official budgetary standards, and above this minimum to establish wage differentials according to skill, training, hazard, and productivity.

The committee is further directed that should it decide that the adoption of the foregoing standards of hours and wages would be practicable, to report its conclusions and recommendations as to the extent and degree of regulation which would be necessary and desirable by the Federal Government to put such standards into effect.

SEC. 4. For the purpose of carrying out the additional authority conferred upon the committee by this resolution, the limit of expenditures of the committee is hereby increased by $———.

CLARIFICATION OF CONSTITUTION BY AMENDMENT

[Mr. WAGNER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD addresses on the subject of the clarification of the Constitution by amendment, delivered at the thirty-seventh annual meeting of the National Consumers' League on Dec. 15, 1936, which appear in the Appendix.]

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3567) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee on page 5, line 6, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 6, the committee proposes to strike out "$790,000,000" and to insert "$775,000,000", so as to read:

To continue to provide relief and work relief as authorized in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, and subject to all the provisions thereof, $775,000,000, which amount shall be added to and proportionately increase the specified amounts of the limitations prescribed under the appropriation made in such act.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the debate on this amendment. Perhaps every Senator is conscious of the necessity for the prompt passage of this relief bill. Other amendments which will require some time for debate are to follow the pending one.

The studies pursued after the debate yesterday was concluded confirm me in the opinion and statement that the $14,000,000, frequently mentioned in the debate and which is sought to be eliminated by the committee amendment, is necessary for the completion of projects already initiated and partially constructed. When one goes into the subject in detail he can readily understand that there is confusion and ground for controversy regarding this matter. Nevertheless, in a few words, I shall attempt to make clearer what was said yesterday by myself and by some other Senators in the course of the debate.

Reference has frequently been made to a $35,000,000 fund which the representatives of the committee suggested could be used for the completion of the projects which would be affected by the $14,000,000 item. Now let me make clear what I attempted to state yesterday. About the 1st of January of this year there was a $35,000,000 fund that had not been expended, but most of it had been allotted and set aside in conformity with the act of 1936 which required that when any project was initiated the funds necessary to its completion should be made available.

It is true that all of that $35,000,000 will not be expended prior to June 30, 1937, the end of the present fiscal year; but it is also true that, in compliance with the requirements of law, the fund has been made available for the completion of projects initiated under the act of 1936.

Prior to the passage of that act, and prior to the projects to which reference was last made in these remarks, a number of projects had been commenced under the Relief Administration of which Mr. Hopkins is the Administrator; also a number of other and additional projects had been commenced under the Department of the Interior. Lately these projects have been transferred to the Resettlement Administration. Many of them are incomplete. It is necessary that the $14,000,000 fund be provided, because the $35,000,000 referred to in the debate has been absorbed already in compliance with the act to which reference has been made. It would be impossible to comply with the terms of the act unless these allotments had been provided or unless they had been set aside.

The $14,000,000 projects are of two classes. First are additional units, as was stated yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] and myself, on projects already started, financed partly from funds provided by the act of 1936, which additional units are necessary to make the projects effective and successful. Second is the completion of construction work on projects financed with funds from other appropriation acts than the act of 1936. These include projects initiated under the Relief Administration and under the Department of the Interior and transferred, as already stated, to the Resettlement Administration.

The allowance of the $14,000,000 fund does not mean new projects. It merely means, as stated yesterday and as is repeated now with emphasis, the completion of the projects already commenced. The refusal to allow the fund, as I said yesterday, would leave on numerous of the projects buildings partly finished which could not be utilized. It would leave projects uncompleted which could not be successful according to the plans under which the projects are being carried forward.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I remember, yesterday it was stated that one of the witnesses testified before the House committee that it would be essential to have this money in order to make a success of existing projects. It can be seen, for instance, that one of the projects might require a water system or a sewerage system or some improvement other than simply the completion of a building.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. I went into that matter in some detail yesterday. There are two classes of work to be completed. First, in order that a project which has been well planned may be completed, it is necessary, as I said yesterday, that certain facilities be provided. Without such facilities the project cannot be completed. It may be that school facilities, waterworks, or lighting facilities for the beneficiaries of projects may be required. In addition to that it may be that units for occupancy by persons to be benefited by the projects, additional to those now constructed, may be necessary in order to make available the facilities referred to, and other factors that necessarily enter into a complete and successful project. The stoppage of work on the projects would deny those facilities in some instances, and in others would deny the finishing of buildings and other works actually already commenced.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I noticed in the RECORD a statement that there was a fund from which moneys were taken with which to purchase property. Have we the assurance of the Department that no further lands will be purchased for resettlement?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no assurance that options already taken and contracts to purchase will not be carried out. I would not wish that such assurance should be given. I have the assurance that no new projects will be initiated until a complete and accurate study of those which have been started has been made and further advice taken regarding the matter.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know whether or not any portion of the $35,000,000 referred to and the $14,000,000 would be used to purchase additional land?

Mr. ROBINSON. No. I assume that if the Resettlement Administration has made a contract for the purchase of land it expects to carry out that contract. I do not know what additional lands may be purchased nor do I know that any additional lands will be purchased. I am referring now to the completion of projects located on lands already purchased. The extension of the program as a whole will not be carried forward until the matter has been studied and worked out.

With this statement, Mr. President, I feel that I am not justified in prolonging the debate on the amendment. I had hoped that the committee might find itself justified in receding from the amendment. It may be that that conclusion yet will be reached. In any event, I think that a decision on the subject ought to be made in the early future in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of other controversial items in the bill.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that, under a ruling of the Chair, if the Senate should concur in the committee amendment to the bill now before the Senate it would preclude the possibility of the consideration of an amendment tendered by myself and 12 other Senators, one of whom has withdrawn his name because of his understanding that a liberal policy is to be pursued within the funds available, it becomes necessary for me to present the matter now or be foreclosed.

I send to the desk the amendment in question and ask that it may be read, because there is a change in the text of the bill as it is now before the Senate. The amendment which was submitted by me would now occur on page 5, line 7, of the bill. The amendment is very simple in that it increases the appropriation from $790,000,000 to $1,200,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the fact that debate apparently has about been concluded on the pending amendment, I am wondering if it would be satisfactory to the Senator to vote by unanimous consent on the pending amendment, with leave to the Senator from Washington to offer his amendment following the decision of the Senate on the amendment immediately before us?

Mr. BONE. I would have no objection to that, but I could not consent to anything that would put me in the position of being foreclosed in presenting my amendment. Because of the tragic conditions confronting the country, I would be doing not only myself but the Senate a disservice in not giving the Senate an opportunity to vote on the question involved in my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I withdraw my request.

Mr. BONE. I am perfectly willing to have a vote taken on the Senator's amendment now, if by unanimous consent I may present my amendment then and not be foreclosed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 7, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out "$775,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,200,000,000."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the amendment of the Senator from Washington offered as an amendment to or a substitute for the committee amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is offered as a substitute for the committee amendment found in the reported bill on line 7, page 5, to strike out the figures "$775,000,000" and substitute "$1,200,000,000." It is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is doing what he would have to do, as suggested yesterday, in order to protect his rights; so I am not complaining, of course. Inasmuch, however, as the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will bring about much debate, and inasmuch as the committee amendment already has had debate and perhaps will have more, I am wondering why the Senator from Arkansas does not carry out his suggestion and ask unanimous consent that the course taken by him be followed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state frankly to the Senator that it is because I was informed that representatives of the committee expect to make a point of order against the amendment of the Senator from Washington, and therefore that they would not agree to a request for unanimous consent, which would deny them the opportunity of making the point of order.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, if a point of order is to be made against this amendment in the face of the conditions that exist in this country, I should just as soon have the point of order raised right now, rather than to expend my energy in a futile effort to help the people of this country who face the tragic conditions they now confront. I suggest to my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], if a point of order is to be made against his amendment, that I wish to save the amount of energy I am going to expend here in an effort to get relief for the poor and the hungry and the flood-stricken people of the country.

I am perfectly frank about this matter. If a technical question is to be raised here, and whatever effort I make in this behalf is to be in vain, I would rather have the question raised right now, because this is a matter I do not want to fool with. My time is precious.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I do not believe it is necessary for me to discuss at any great length, nor do I wish to occupy the floor here too long in a discussion of things with which we are all more or less familiar. Certainly Members of the Senate today are familiar with the great tragedy which has overwhelmed the country in the terrible flood which is now going on and is devastating whole sections of the country. In addition, we confront the tragic spectacle of millions of unemployed. I desire to confine my remarks as far as possible to the unemployment situation out in the Northwest, with which I am chiefly concerned, although I am very deeply and profoundly concerned with the conditions that exist all over the country.

In presenting this substitute amendment, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] requested that his name be withdrawn because of some understanding he had with Mr. Hopkins relative to the amount of money that would be available.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is manifest that the consideration of this amendment may require considerable time. It is my purpose to propose a unanimous-consent agreement that will preserve whatever rights may exist as to the amendment now presented by the Senator from Washington and at the same time will not preclude the point of order to which reference was made a moment ago.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed to vote on the amendment of the committee, the pending amendment, and in the event the amendment should be agreed to it may still be in order for the Senator from Washington to offer his amendment, subject to such points of order as would lie if the amendment were offered now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as for me, I am very clear as to the situation. I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas is in line with the procedure which ought to be followed in the consideration of this bill. I feel certain that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] is subject to a point of order. However, if the question is not to be raised now, I think we should adopt the proposal made by the Senator from Arkansas, with the understanding that in the disposition of the committee amendment debate shall proceed to its logical conclusion, and not have a vote immediately upon the proposal. Is that the intention of the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. I had not intended to preclude further debate on the amendment. I think the debate has about been exhausted.

Mr. McNARY. I do not know as to that, Mr. President. I have nothing to say on that subject. Certainly after the Senator from Washington has presented his proposal some one may wish to follow him on behalf of the committee. I do not desire to consent, and I shall not consent, to any agreement that will foreclose further debate upon the proposal made by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will modify the request so as to save the point, if the Senator thinks it is important to do so.

Mr. McNARY. I think it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the debate on the pending amendment the Senate proceed to vote upon it, and that if the amendment shall be agreed to the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] may nevertheless offer his amendment, subject to such points of order as might be made if his amendment were considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to add a word or two to what has already been said. Probably it is not an addition to but a repetition of what was said on yesterday.

In proposing the amendment, the committee had as its foundation two things. The first was a conviction, from hearing witnesses before the committee and a study of the record, that the $14,000,000 is not necessary to the efficient and expeditious continuation of the resettlement projects. The second was the fact which was more impressive upon the committee yesterday than today, that the 1936 deficiency bill contained the provision quoted yesterday, in the following words:

> No Federal project shall be undertaken or prosecuted under the foregoing appropriation unless and until an amount sufficient for its completion has been allocated and irrevocably set aside for its completion.

It seemed to the committee that we were confronted in this case with a disregard of that provision. On yesterday, however, the Senate by a small majority apparently took the position that it was not concerned with the enforcement of its own rules. We had laid down certain rules in reference to the appropriations for the Post Office Department. Those rules were disregarded and defied; and the argument was presented that disregarding the limitations imposed by the appropriations would be in the interest of public service, and therefore that the decision of a department should be superior to the decision of the Congress. That, in substance, was the decision of yesterday.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ADAMS. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Without regard to the decision of yesterday, and with regard to the matter immediately under consideration, I should like to point out to the Senator, if I did not make it clear in my former remarks, that this complication has arisen largely because of carrying out the mandate of the Congress. Allotments having been made to projects that had been initiated, and which projects cannot be completed prior to the end of the fiscal year, it would be impossible for Resettlement to comply with the rules laid down without making allotments or setting aside funds under the act of 1936 which would not be completely expended by the end of this fiscal year, because, as everyone ought to understand, it is not possible to finish all projects on an exact given date. Some of these projects necessarily will not be completed until sometime during the next fiscal year; so that instead of being an effort to override the rule of Congress, it is in every respect an effort to carry out the rule of Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, one of the words in the act which I may say disturbed the committee at the time of the hearing was included in the provision that projects should not be "undertaken or prosecuted" unless funds were set aside for their completion, and the argument is now made that funds additional should be allocated by Congress for the completion of projects, some of which were commenced and some of which were prosecuted without the funds for their completion having been set aside. That is perhaps a matter of legal construction which, as I say, was more impressive yesterday than it is today.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I stated a few moments ago that subsequent to the passage of the act of 1936, and subsequent to the initiation of most of these projects under that act, there was transferred to the Resettlement Administration the completion and the administration of projects which had already been commenced under other appropriation acts, under the Secretary of the Interior and under Mr. Hopkins, the relief administrator, and that principally this $14,000,000 appropriation is to complete such projects.

The Resettlement Administration did exactly what was required under the act of 1936. It did set aside funds to complete all the projects undertaken and prosecuted under that act. But there were other projects which came to it subsequently which either had to be abandoned and the money which had already been spent on them by other departments wasted, or they had to go forward; and the $14,000,000 is necessary in order to carry out the mandate of Congress of 1936.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I think it should be said that the Resettlement Administration as at present constituted inherited what could properly be defined as a "mess" from its predecessor. It is entitled to sympathy and consideration, because when the present group came into control there was a situation which had been developed which was really indefensible, and I think they have done the best they could.

What I have been trying to make clear is that the Committee on Appropriations, in their effort to follow the law, feeling bound by the law, have presented to the Senate their judgment upon this matter based upon the facts. The Senate may exercise its judgment now; it may disregard its judgment of a year ago, and that will be entirely agreeable to the Committee on Appropriations. But we would do less than our duty if we did not present the case as we saw it in the committee room when faced with the witnesses and the testimony as to the condition.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to ask the Senator whether there is not another factor involved in the committee amendment, which is a lesser factor, to be sure; but is not the committee proposing to reduce the administrative expenses of the Resettlement Administration?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will not the Senator testify upon that subject briefly?

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator that if the expenditures should be reduced $14,000,000, very obviously there would be a reduction in the necessary administrative expenses, and the ratio of administrative expense to total expense is such as to justify fully a million-dollar reduction in administrative expenses.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ADAMS. Gladly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Might it not also be said that the figures disclose the fact that 18 percent of the Resettlement request in this bill is for administrative overhead, that 18 cents out of every dollar is for administrative overhead; and that that is an unconscionable amount of overhead in relation to relief?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not find anything in the bill which bears out that statement. I will say that in the preceding administration there was a high ratio of administrative expense to total expense. The officials before the committee endeavored to explain the occasion for that, pointing out that the Resettlement Administration was operating in almost every county in the United States; that they were extending relief by grants to hundreds of thousands of individuals; that they were making thousands of small loans; that handling those matters and making the investigations involved a personnel and an expense greater than that of other agencies of the Government; and that the administrative expense did not arise to so great an extent from the projects we are now discussing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment on this point?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Confirming what the Senator from Colorado has just said about the administrative expense, the Resettlement Administration has been compelled to undertake a very large task in the nature of relief. There are thousands of farmers in the drought area—one might say hundreds of thousands—who cannot avail themselves of loans from any existing agency other than the Resettlement Administration, because they have no collateral. The Resettlement Administration, in my judgment, is doing extraordinarily good work in that particular. They are investigating cases rapidly, and they are advancing funds to farmers in the drought area necessary to enable them to go along—funds which cannot be secured from crop-production credits or from banks or any other credit agency because the borrowers have no collateral: The machinery of the Resettlement Administration necessarily is large in carrying on that activity, but it is an indispensable activity, and a very helpful one, in the opinion of many who have studied it.

I know of communities in our country where men who have been successful farmers for almost a lifetime, men who own their own homes, who have the ability necessary to cultivate their farms, and whose pasture facilities usually are adequate, have had placed upon them, in some areas for 5 successive years, the withering hand of drought. Many of them have borrowed to the extent of their ability to borrow, through mortgages on their farms, and through mortgages on their livestock. They have not now the feed that is necessary to prevent their cattle and their horses and other livestock from starving and dying on the withered fields which they formerly used as pastures. The Resettlement Administration is affording assistance in these cases, and doing it promptly. It is not rendering assistance in every case where assistance is required; those who can get loans from credit agencies, whether private or public, are required to go there; but he whose resources have been exhausted, and who yet is unwilling to join a bread line, and put his wife and children at the mercy of charity, can still obtain help. It requires a large number of agents to carry out that purpose, which has augmented the administrative cost. But it is a meritorious plan, a helpful plan, and one that is tending to conserve the pride of men who are just as deserving as any citizens of this country can be, and who are unwilling to beg. They still want to use the little they have left in making a living for themselves and their families.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to respond; but the Senator from South Carolina has some figures, and I yield to him.

Mr. BYRNES. There can be no question about the great service rendered to the individual farmer by the Resettlement Administration. But agents of the Farm Credit Administration also go among the farmers, not to make grants, not to give them something, but to make loans to enable them to retain their self-respect; and the administrative expense of the Farm Credit Administration, in my opinion, would be but about one-third that of the Resettlement Administration.

The committee has in mind only the thought that because no specific amount is carried in this bill for administrative expenses, it could not remedy the situation, it could not call it to the attention of the Senate, in any way other than by making a reduction of a million dollars, and then placing in the report the reason for that action. The reason is, as stated in the report, that there should be a reduction in the administrative expenses, not out in the field, not in the drought-stricken sections, or in the rural sections of the country, where this great service is being rendered, but in the District of Columbia alone. Why? Because the figures show that in the District of Columbia for personal services for this year they expect to spend $4,767,000. We ascertained that in the District of Columbia they have approximately 2,700 employees. Out in the field in this great work they have 10,000 employees; but the 2,700 employees in the District of Columbia receive approximately the same compensation as the 10,000 employees out in the field rendering service to the farmers. The reason for it is that in the District of Columbia there are 80 employees drawing salaries of $5,000 and more per year. Out in the field, in the various regions of this great country, there are only 54 employees drawing salaries of $5,000; and of those employed in the field—and there are but a few of them—the highest salary paid is $7,000.

Mr. President, we can reach this situation in no way other than by expressing to the Executive, through the committee report, our belief that there should be some check upon the administrative expenses of this organization. I have in my office, and other Senators have in their offices, the best illustration of the situation, being a report to the President and to the Congress, wherein there is contained a map so expensive, so unusual, that the Government Printing Office could not print it, and, according to the information I have, it cost $1.05 to print each one of those maps outside of the Government Printing Office. I understand that now the Joint Committee on Printing is going to take some steps to limit the expenditure for the printing of maps by any department. The Congress wants reports from departments of the Government, and so does the President, but we do not need 5,000 or more copies of them, and we do not need such a report as has been presented for our information, constituting, with pictures, the most elaborate and most expensive report ever printed by any department of the Government.

Mr. President, the committee report is submitted solely in the hope of calling that situation to the attention of those who have charge of such matters. The report in question, containing the map, is of no personal service to the members of the Appropriations Committee. When such things come to our notice we believe we should call attention to them; and the only way we can do so in connection with the pending bill is through the medium of a committee report asking that a reduction of a million dollars to be made in the expenses in the District of Columbia.

There is another reason for such action. The Resettlement Administration has been merged with the Department of Agriculture. If by taking that independent organization into and merging it with a regular department of the Government no reduction can be made, particularly in the salaries of $5,000 a year and over, it is exceedingly unfortunate, because the amount of more than $5,000,000 expended in the District of Columbia is excessive.

Regardless of the view that may be taken as to the $14,000,000, I wish the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], instead of asking that the reduction be entirely eliminated, could see his way clear to amend his amendment so as to make it not apply to the $1,000,000, the only purpose of which would be to reduce the expenses in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have offered no amendment. I am resisting the committee amendment. However, I shall, if that will be satisfactory to the committee, consent to the amendment which would comprehend a reduction in administrative expenses. I am not prepared to state the circumstances which would justify that. However, the Senator may be entirely familiar with it, and I should rely on his judgment. If the $14,000,000 could stay in the bill, I should be willing to make the reduction suggested and let the matter go to conference.

Mr. BYRNES. If I may make a suggestion to the Senator from Arkansas, instead of resisting the amendment, how would he view a proposition to amend the figures in the bill, adding the $14,000,000, but, instead of a total of $790,000,000, making the figure $789,000,000? Then on the merits, as to the Senator's proposition and as to the other consideration, the question could be settled.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is agreeable to Senators, I should be willing to do it. That would still leave the matter in conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption at that point?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that could be done on the right kind of a showing, even after we should have voted on this amendment. A Senator may offer any amendment he sees fit to offer. I should dislike to see the measure cluttered up now with this proposed amendment. It seems to me that what has just been suggested can be done equally well after we vote on the question now before us.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is true. The proposal just made would complicate the whole question.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire briefly to respond to the observations of the able Senator from Arkansas, which seem to have been originally provoked by my inquiry regarding the administrative expenses.

If the figures presented in the other House are reliable, $49,000,000 of the sum total of Resettlement resources remaining for this year are to be spent for subsistence homesteads and $14,000,000 for administration; and there is not any "withered stock" in any of it except as it relates to such administration having to do with that particular factor. Eighteen cents out of every relief dollar goes for administration so far as this particular appropriation is concerned. I do not think there is any "withered stock" in any of these dream cities which have not as yet been opened, and which, when they are opened, are probably going to cost so much to live in that nobody but one of the upper-income group can hope to qualify for occupancy of them.

Furthermore, I will ask the Senator whether a Resettlement division, supposedly dealing with the most vivid type of relief necessities, needs to spend $289,000 in 14 months for publicity—nearly $300,000 advertising for clients! I respectfully suggest that the sturdy observations of the Senator from South Carolina are entitled to prayerful consideration.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am anxious to conclude my remarks.

Mr. BLACK. I am sure of that; but, Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan made a statement for which I do not find support in the record. I find a statement which indicates to the contrary, and I am sure he would not have made his statement unless he had in mind some place in the record on which to base his statement. Therefore I desire to call attention to the fact that on page 257 of the record it is shown that the administrative expense and voluntary farm debt adjustment are $14,000,000. That $14,000,000 is a part, not of $49,000,000, but of $158,000,000.

So I cannot see the slightest basis in those figures for the statement of 18 percent being used for administrative expenses. On the contrary, the sum is not even 18 percent for the administrative expense coupled with the voluntary farm-debt adjustment. All of us know that voluntary farm debt adjustment expenditures would constitute a large part of that total.

Mr. ADAMS. I may say to the Senator that I think there are some figures in the record on that point. My recollection is that either one or two million dollars was the amount stated in the record as expended for farm debt adjustment.

Mr. BYRNES. On page 246 it will be seen that the amount is $2,749,000.

Mr. BLACK. That would leave between eleven million and twelve million dollars for administrative expenses out of a total expenditure of $158,000,000, as shown on page 257 of the record.

Mr. BYRNES. I must say that we are talking about different things. The figures to which the Senator from Colorado referred in his statement, as to the farm debt-adjustment program, show that it had cost $2,749,000 to November 30, 1936.

Mr. BLACK. The statement referred to does not show which part of the $14,000,000 is for administrative expense and which part is for voluntary farm-debt adjustment. There are no figures, then, that the Senator knows of in the record which would distinguish between the two portions of the expenditures?

Mr. BYRNES. The statement on page 247 may give the Senator the information he desires.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I merely wish to give the Senator from Alabama the basis of my statement. I am reading from page 436 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, from the address by the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which states that $14,000,000 is for administration, and that is the only statement he makes. That is the basis for my observation.

Mr. BLACK. I was sure the Senator had seen that statement somewhere.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume that the chairman of the House committee was reliably informed.

Mr. BLACK. The record shows, however, that that particular statement, by whomsoever it might have been made and at whatsoever place made, was a mistake, because on page 257 the break-down, which appears at the bottom of the page—the Senator will find it in the House hearings—shows a total expenditure of $158,000,000, with $14,000,000 for the two items mentioned, which, of course, would be a very much smaller percentage, as the Senator from Michigan will recognize.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I think probably under Mr. BUCHANAN's statement the $14,000,000 of administrative expenses should be allocated against the complete total of $158,000,000. Still, regardless of what the actual percentage may prove to be, I think any comparison of the relative administrative expense in the relief agencies of the Government will show that the Resettlement Administration is breaking all records, and that it is a challenge which, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has indicated, ought to be met with some affirmative indication on the part of the Congress that it would like a nickel's worth of economy, at least; and particularly is that pertinent when we find, according to their own letter—which is my authority in that instance—that they have spent $289,000 for so-called information work in 14 months.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall not interrupt the Senator without his consent, of course; but he has been interrupted so much, and so many remarks have been made about the Resettlement Administration, that I feel that I want to say something about that subject. If the Senator would rather I should do so, I shall wait until he is through.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should be glad if the Senator would permit me to proceed, because I have just a few things I desire to put into the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I will wait until the Senator shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have just one comment in reference to the expense item. In the record is the statement that the allocation for administrative expense made at the time of the original appropriation of $85,000,000 would be adequate for operations under a still larger appropriation; so that I think the same proportionate administrative expense would not be necessary when an additional sixty-five or eighty million dollars is made available.

I wish to give just a few items of information gathered from the record; and I think the Senator from Arkansas will concur with me that it is not the easiest record in the world from which to gather facts.

The aggregate estimated cost of all these projects as set forth in the tabulation which the Senator from Arkansas put into the RECORD, and which is in the committee hearings, is $91,000,000. That amount includes all that has been expended, all that is on hand, and the $14,000,000 to complete all the projects.

Thirty-five million dollars is available, which leaves a sum of $56,000,000. Deducting $14,000,000 would indicate that $42,000,000 had actually been expended. The Resettlement projects have been going on for some time. Apparently from these figures during that time $42,000,000 has been spent; so it seems to me that in the next 5 months $35,000,000 would be adequate to carry on the work.

As to the number of projects there are listed in this complete list 13,566 units. I think there are 105 projects embracing the 13,566 units.

On page 82 appears the statement that of the 13,900 units approximately 7,000 have been started. In other words, there has been started only a little more than half of the projected units within the contemplated projects. The statement appears then, on page 81, that there have been approximately 3,000 units actually completed, thereby leaving roughly 4,000 units which have been started but which have not been completed.

The average cost per unit, according to the figures furnished us, including the land, is $7,000. So $28,000,000 should be adequate to complete every unit the construction of which has been started.

With these figures in mind it seems to me it is demonstrated by the statement of the Resettlement Administration authorities that they do not need an additional sum at this time to complete the units which have been started.

There is one instance of unusual figuring. The Resettlement Administration originally asked for $90,000,000. When they asked for $90,000,000 they said it would take $17,000,000 to complete these projects. When they are cut down to $80,000,000 they say they can complete them for $14,000,000, and they proceed to allocate the $14,000,000 down to the last dollar to each of the projects, just so much for this project, so much for that project, and so much for the others, which totals up exactly $14,000,000. I commend the accuracy of their prospective mathematics. I have had some experience in construction and I marvel at their accuracy and their ability to allocate the cost right down to the dollar between the 57 or 60 projects.

That simply leads, Mr. President, to the conclusion that, as indicated by the rest of the record, the movement started as a dream, and it is still incomplete. We want to go ahead; we do not want the money wasted; but if you will look at the record, Mr. President, which was put in yesterday, you will, I think, be amazed at the cost of the individual units, running in one State to $14,750. That is hardly a relief project. In other States the cost runs to $11,700; in other States to $12,350 per unit; other units involve a cost of $11,200; others, $10,600; others, $10,200. The average is $7,000 per unit; that is per house.

The difficulty is that if the entire project is carried through it is contemplated that only 13,566 heads of families will be taken care of. It seems to me that the money appropriated by Congress should have been spread a little thinner. I think that those in need of help—and they are the people, I think, we should have in mind—cannot pay their way out on the basis of $12,000, or even $10,000, units. If provision were made for units—and there are some of that kind—involving a cost of $3,000 or $3,500 and more modest houses, with an equal area of ground, I think the Resettlement Administration and the Congress would be doing a better job and would take care of more people. But I have been amazed at the fact that only 7,000 people are to be taken care of by the projects which are now under construction and those which have been constructed.

Concluding, Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I have not been able to see the force of the argument which calls for an additional appropriation, and I still feel that the committee gave to the Senate accurate and sound advice in proposing this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak on this subject. I feel that it is my duty to do so, however, after listening to the arguments made by various Senators as to the Resettlement projects. Of course, I should like to have administrative expenses reduced as much as possible, and I preface what I am going to say by the statement that I am not in favor of extravagance; I do not believe that the overhead expense ought to be increased more than is necessary; but I have had occasion to observe so often and for such a comparatively long period of time and have had so much to do with the operations of the Resettlement Administration, that it seems to me I cannot permit the present opportunity to pass without saying something in its defense.

Most of the Senators have been discussing projects. It may be that the word "resettlement" naturally leads one to think that this is a branch of the Government having to do mostly with the building of houses, sewer systems, electric-light systems, and waterworks. But, Mr. President, a large area of our country was suffering from drought. As the chairman of the committee himself has said, the Resettlement Administration operated in practically every county in the United States. A large portion of the great Mississippi Valley was affected, as was the remainder of the country, by the depression. All suffered from it, but in addition to that came the terrible drought. In some localities, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has so eloquently stated, 5 years elapsed without a farmer in an excellent farming section producing any crop. That condition, more or less, with variations, extended over a large number of States. When that condition is considered in connection with the depression it presents a picture that is almost appalling.

The Resettlement Administration had precipitated upon it from time to time various problems growing out of the depression and the drought. They were not merely engaged in building houses or work of that kind but, little by little, from one activity of the administration or another, the needs of additional numbers of suffering people were dumped into the lap of the Resettlement Administration, and that organization was faced with the problem of saving the lives of starving millions of men, women, and little children. Almost overnight from vast regions of the country some of these problems were forced upon the Resettlement Administration. As the Senator from Arkansas has so well said, many farmers had not raised a crop for years; they had mortgaged everything they had on earth; they had no place to go to get any money. Ordinarily they could have borrowed, and obtained food or money from their neighbors.

They would have been able to borrow from their banks. They had already done so. The winds came and the rains failed to come, and the crops which they had labored to plant and cultivate withered and died because of a lack of moisture.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Reinforcing what the Senator has stated, the Resettlement Administration is making grants of an average of $20 a month to 420,000 farm families in the drought area. It is practically the only assistance that has been made available to them. This activity is costing approximately $8,000,000 a month during the present winter.

In addition to that, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Resettlement Administration is performing the only housing service for persons living in rural districts that is being rendered on behalf of the Government of the United States, in contrast to the hundreds of millions of dollars that are being properly expended for slum clearance and housing facilities and related subjects in the large centers.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Add that situation to the picture. When we see what is being done, should we feel that we ought to reduce the administrative expenses of the Resettlement Administration? Go out into the field, as I have done, and see what they are doing. In every county seat and in most of the towns outside of the county seat in every county is someone representing the Resettlement Administration. Is it extravagant to have them there? Would anyone suggest that with 150 farm families in a given area, a comparatively small area, there should be no one to supervise the work? What would the critics say if that were done? What would be said by those who are now finding fault with every appearance of extravagance to which they can point a finger if the Resettlement Administration had not sent its men out to take charge of the work?

What does a Resettlement representative do in the town where he is sent? He perhaps has a list which may be determined afterward to be only a partial list or it may be a list from which some of the names can be stricken. He investigates each individual case. Is not that necessary? Should we do away with that expense? A farmer comes in to see the representative and tells about his condition. If he is in doubt about anything, the investigator takes the necessary steps to learn all the facts, to prevent any fraud, and to prevent any dishonest man from getting relief. That requires investigation and costs money. Would anyone do away with that work? Would anyone furnish $20 per family to every man in the country regardless of who he was or what his necessities were or whether his family needed it?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I ask the Senator, considering what he has stated and what he knows about the situation, if it is not inevitable that any organization dealing with the people in sections where the population is more or less sparse has to incur greater administrative expense than if it were dealing with a similar number of people located in a closely populated city where they could be easily communicated with and interviewed?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly. I have endeavored to investigate some of the representatives of the Resettlement Administration. I have talked with many of them. I have listened to their problems. "How do you do this work? What do you find?" The reports I have had from these men would break a heart of stone. The suffering they find is indescribable.

A man has lived on a farm, ordinarily a fertile farm, for many years. He may be in debt, though he ought not to be. Perhaps he has not exercised the proper care, but has gone into debt when better judgment should have kept him from doing so. But that is water over the wheel. He is in debt; his wheat crop has failed; his corn crop has failed; his pasture has dried up; his stock is dying. A year or two ago the Government took some of his stock, in some cases a great deal of it, which otherwise would have perished because of a lack of food and water.

The farmer has a family. He loves his family just as much as though he lived in a palace or in a great city. His wife is intelligent, perhaps a graduate of a college or perhaps not. She is a human being. Her children are around her crying for food, ragged because they cannot afford clothing. The crops have all failed this year, last year, and in many cases the preceding year and the year before that. Where would they go? Ask yourselves the question. Where could they go? In the first place, they would have to be assisted to go anywhere else; but would they be any better off if they should go somewhere else?

We are faced with a problem which would seem to be impossible of solution. I do not know of any way to solve it, and yet it must be solved. We must find some way to do away with the human agony, the human anguish, the human suffering that prevails in many of our country homes in a great portion of the United States.

The Resettlement Administration has charge of this work to a great extent. At the beginning I did not understand that they had. I think they have done a magnificent work. They are criticized because they do not do enough and criticized because they do too much. They are condemned in every locality because they do not supply all that some of the sufferers want. They are not popular in any community, as a rule. But I say, Mr. President, if the Resettlement agents are human, if they have hearts, especially if they have wives and children of their own, they cannot turn a deaf ear to those who are pleading for life, to be allowed to live.

Farmers in this condition cannot get money anywhere. They do not want to become beggars. They do not want to go on the relief rolls and be fed from public charity. Many of them are compelled to adopt that course, and it is no disgrace to them. Eventually many of them are simply driven there, but in most cases they want to stay off the relief roll if they can possibly do so. They lay the facts before the representative of the Resettlement Administration. It takes time to investigate each case. Delays occur, but we cannot delay the demands of the appetite. It is useless to call for delay to keep one from grieving when he has not clothes to cover his nakedness. There cannot be delay in the case of the farmer's stock; it must be fed now. Yet delays occur, perhaps more than they should. They occur because it is known that all over the country is a class of people who are going to find fault, who are going to criticize, who are going to condemn if they find a case where one penny has been lost or wasted.

We cannot or should not compare dollars with human lives. We cannot or should not measure the suffering in our country on the basis of the dollars and cents that might be saved if we cut this man's salary or that man's salary or withheld 5 cents from the support of this needy family, or if we made a mistake and gave someone relief who, perhaps, ought not to have had it.

It may be, from the tenderness of their hearts, listening to the pleas for mercy of the suffering and anguished that the Resettlement representatives overstep their duty. I do not know that this is so, but it is only natural that it should be so. But should we then complain that we are spending too much for overhead? It would not be possible to go out into the country and make selections among the needy cases without expending some overhead. That is what the Resettlement Administration mainly is doing throughout the great suffering portions of our country. They are doing a fine job. I should not want to curtail their activities in the slightest. I should like to save overhead if I could, but let us not give that as an excuse for preventing the necessary investigation and the necessary examination which must be made in the field, which must be made on the ground. It cannot be made elsewhere. Unless such investigation and examination be made, the Administration would lay itself open to the charge of extravagance, unnecessary extravagance, that ultimately might be proven against it.

I do not believe there is a man at work out in the field who is not necessary. When I look over the ground in a given locality I wonder how these agencies do as much as they do without more assistance. As a general rule, I have not found the men with whom I have talked to be hard-hearted. They are in sympathy with their work. They are in sympathy with suffering humanity. So far as I can observe, they are doing the best they can to give relief where it is most needed. One of the cruelest things of all, it seems to me, comes about when these men, doing the best they can, are criticized by those who are in power, those who wish to get in power, and also by the very persons they are trying to help, because in many cases they cannot pay for the absolute necessities with the amount of money the Resettlement Administration can give them. They cannot relieve these people from suffering. They merely save them from starvation; that is all. They do not keep these people in luxury. These poor folk are waiting and hanging on now, hoping and praying that God will send them rains next year and bring crops to millions and millions of acres of our fertile soil. Unless He does, these people must all perish. They cannot live the way they are living now, even with the support we are giving them, and I think Senators ought to be careful before they cut an expense of this kind.

I do not know anything that we could do anywhere that would be entirely exempt from criticism or wrongdoing. That will creep in, no matter what we do. Occasionally a man will have an administrative job who never ought to have had it, who ought to be kicked out, who has no sympathy with his work. That will always be true. That is especially true in our democracy. That is one of the things we have to endure. We must not ask or expect perfection.

Taking it all in all, Mr. President, I think the committee amendment ought to be defeated. In the interest of efficiency and in the interest of humanity, it seems to me it ought to be defeated.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I cannot allow to pass unnoticed the remarks just made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr.

NORRIS]. They are based upon an entire misapprehension of the facts.

The Committee on Appropriations does not propose to reduce by one cent the amount of money to be expended by the Resettlement Administration in its operations in the field. The committee report states:

Decrease: Allotment to Resettlement Administration for personal administrative services in the District of Columbia, $1,000,000.

It was ascertained that it costs about $5,000,000 to carry on the work of the Resettlement Administration in its headquarters here in Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Who is objecting to that reduction? I have not raised any objection to it, and I do not think that is involved in this question.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is all that is involved in the committee amendment with respect to reduction of personal services.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. HAYDEN. The cut recommended by the committee is solely a reduction in personal expenses in the District of Columbia. I desire particularly to have the Senator understand that the entire Committee on Appropriations is just as sympathetic as he is with the activities of the Resettlement Administration in the field. The committee does not propose to reduce by one cent the amount of money necessary for the employment of personnel in the field.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's remarks, of course, relate solely to the question of administrative costs.

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not refer to the committee amendment. He does not mean to say that the sole purpose of the committee amendment is to reduce administrative costs.

Mr. HAYDEN. No. As I understood the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, his great objection to the committee amendment was to the amount of the reduction in the expenses for personal services. The Senator assumed that the committee was attempting to cut down the number of persons employed by the Resettlement Administration in the field. That is not the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; that is not the case. I wish to have the Senator understand that I am not criticizing the motives of anybody. I certainly am not questioning the motives of the committee.

This amendment is a sort of a lump sum. The committee has not broken down, in this amendment, or in the original law, what it consists of. It has great ramifications. It covers the entire United States.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Nebraska is again mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. The Resettlement Administration covers the entire United States. The chairman of the Senator's own committee himself said a few minutes ago that the Resettlement Administration operates in practically every county in the United States.

Mr. HAYDEN. The point I wish to emphasize is that the committee followed its usual and customary practice when dealing with lump sums of money and seeking to make a reduction. The sum of money in the bill has been reduced. The report of the committee states where the reduction is to take effect. I read to the Senator from the committee report, and I now repeat what the committee says:

Decrease: Allotment to Resettlement Administration for personal administrative services in the District of Columbia, $1,000,000.

The other purpose, and the remaining $14,000,000 of the $15,000,000 reduction, is in the allotment to the Resettlement Administration for rural resettlement and subsistence homestead projects. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in the course of his remarks, stated what the committee is fully aware of, and with which it is in entire sympathy—that the Resettlement Administration makes grants and loans, and that it is the only agency of the Government which can make grants to persons in distress. I wish to point out to the Senator and to the Senate that there is no reduction in the amount of money appropriated for such purposes. If this amendment is adopted, there will still be available to the Resettlement Administration exactly what it asked for for the following purposes:

For rural rehabilitation loans, $58,246,000.

For rural rehabilitation grants, $30,398,000.

For submarginal land purchases, $437,000.

For land development on submarginal purchases, $5,177,000.

The only reductions suggested in these appropriations are $1,000,000 in the administrative expenses in Washington and $14,000,000 in rural resettlement and subsistence homestead projects. So everything that the Senator has said in praise of the Resettlement Administration, with respect to the excellent work it is doing in all of these other fields has the entire concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations. We are just as sympathetic with its activities and just as proud of what it is doing as is the Senator. The committee, however, desires to make it clear to the Senator and to the Senate that the only issued raised here is with respect to these two matters, to wit: Administrative expenses in the District of Columbia and the cost of rural resettlement and subsistence homestead projects.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator some questions on the subject matter of administrative costs?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The debate really has shifted from the large proposal relating to the $14,000,000 for completion of projects to a proposal to cut off $1,000,000 of administrative expenses in Washington. If the administrative expenses in Washington are out of proportion to the service performed, of course the reduction ought to be made; but I am wondering how far the committee went into that matter. I have gone into it since the amendment was proposed, and I find that the figures do not justify the implication of the remarks of my friend, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Let me ask if the Senator from Arizona is informed as to the approximate percentage the total number of employees here in Washington bears to those in the field in connection with resettlement.

Mr. HAYDEN. No. My information is that the cost of administration in the District of Columbia is practically the same as, or a very little less than, the entire cost of administration in the field.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there must be some error about that. Does the Senator know the average salary of employees in the District of Columbia in Resettlement?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am informed that it is about $2,800 a year.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is evidently a dispute about that. I do not want to become too far involved in it, because I have never investigated the details; but the information supplied me in compliance with my request is that the average salary in Washington is $1,882, instead of $2,800 as just stated by the Senator from Arizona. That makes a very notable difference. The percentage of Resettlement employees who are in the field is approximately 75 percent, compared with 25 percent in Washington.

Mr. HAYDEN. Which, I will state to the Senator, is a much higher ratio than is normal in the case of other Federal activities.

Mr. ROBINSON. In all probability that is true, and I do not know all the reasons for the existence of that higher ratio.

Mr. WHEELER. That would be only natural, particularly in the Resettlement Administration, where it is necessary to send men out into the field to supervise the distribution of the money, particularly where it is distributed for relief. I can readily understand that. I think it is only natural.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I apprehend that when the matter is gone into, the statement of the Senator from Nebraska will be pretty well sustained.

Instead of $2,800 being the average annual salary of employees of the Resettlement Administration in Washington, the figures supplied me, presumably from the record, show that the average salary is $1,882. What is the average salary of employees in the field? Something like 71 percent of the cost of Resettlement has been incurred in the field, and 29 percent of the total cost in Washington. The actual cost of salaries of Resettlement employees in the field is $1,451, compared with $1,882 for the employees in Washington.

The very able junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], a great student, a hard worker, and a reliable Senator, made a statement which warranted the conclusion that salaries in Washington for Resettlement employees were out of proportion and unduly high as compared with the salaries of employees in the field. The record, as I have it, shows that $1,882 is the average salary for employees in Washington and $1,451 for employees in the field. It is expected that if the comparison were carried out for other departments the figures so far as salaries in the field are concerned would be quite favorable to Resettlement.

Everyone knows that salaries of Government employees in Washington are, on the average, higher than Government salaries elsewhere. The salaries in Washington have to be higher, but, instead of being $2,800, as suggested by my friend the Senator from Arizona, the average as represented to me from the record is $1,882, and the average for the employees in the field, as I have previously stated, is only $1,451. The amount of money spent in the field is 71 percent of the total, as compared with 29 percent spent in Washington.

Mr. HAYDEN. Nevertheless, it is costing approximately $5,000,000 a year to carry on the work of the Resettlement Administration in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, let me give some figures coming from the record, the same source from which the Senator from Arkansas gets his figures. The figures I have show that there are 2,778 employees in the District of Columbia, and that their average salary is $1,882, which makes a total of $5,228,196. In the field there are 10,482 employees.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me repeat that it is costing over $5,000,000 a year to maintain the office of the Resettlement Administration in Washington. The committee was of the opinion that that sum of money can be very properly reduced, and is suggesting that the Administration try to get along with a little better than $4,000,000 during the fiscal year.

Be that as it may, let us take up the other question; that is, the rural and suburban resettlement program, which is something that did not originate with the Resettlement Administration. It was inherited from a bureau transferred to the Resettlement Administration from the Interior Department and by transfer of projects from the Works Progress Administration.

The tabulation on page 252 of the House hearings shows that the projects initiated by the Division of Subsistence Homesteads in the Interior Department number 3,498; that is, they will take care of 3,498 families, and that their total cost will be $26,395,000. The average cost per family will be about $7,000.

The next group, listed on the following page, is of projects initiated not by the Resettlement Administration but by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, which were likewise acquired by transfer. Those projects number 3,643, and are to cost, when completed, $15,245,000, which would be over $4,000 per family.

The third group of projects are of the infiltration type and number 2,066, costing $10,096,000, or about $5,000 per family.

As the Senator from Colorado has stated, the combined total of the number of families to be benefited by the rural and suburban resettlement program which we are appropriating money to complete is only 13,566. The Federal Government will expend $91,759,000 to take care of about 13,500 families. That is a program which is so essentially unsound that it cannot continue. There is not enough money in the Treasury, and never will be, and the credit of the United States will never be great enough to undertake to give to all other persons similarly situated in the United States like housing accommodations. There are so many hundreds of thousands of families needing better homes that it simply cannot be done by following that method. The most encouraging note I have heard in the course of the debate on the pending amendment is the statement read into the RECORD by the Senator from Arkansas, which was sent to him by the Secretary of Agriculture, which said:

> That further construction should not be started until a very careful study is made of the whole program for the development of farmsteads.

Let it be perfectly plain to all Senators that the Senate Committee on Appropriations does not desire to stop the construction of any one of the rural and suburban resettlement projects which has been initiated. The committee wants to see them all completed, and the best of our judgment is that enough money is already available to the Resettlement Administration to carry on the work from now until June 30. It was, therefore, our judgment that this $14,000,000 is not necessary.

The committee knew there would be a regular appropriation bill to care for further construction during the next fiscal year. We knew there would be other deficiency bills, if we should make any mistake in this instance, but the committee did want to indicate to the Resettlement Administration, to the Senate, and to the country that no new projects should be started.

No new projects may be started, but much money may be spent in adding new units to existing projects. That is what is actually proposed to be done with this $14,000,000.

It seems to me that the Secretary of Agriculture is perfectly sound in the statement that nothing new is to be undertaken until a further study of the subject is made. The Congress is entitled to have the benefit of such a study, because it is perfectly obvious to anyone that the Federal Government cannot find money enough to take care of all the people who ought to have better rural homes.

It is obvious that an approach had to be made toward the solution of this problem. Someone had to conduct the experiment. Little or nothing was known about farmsteads and rural resettlement in the United States. The money that has been expended, although some of it perhaps has been wasted, has been well spent, in my judgment. I am glad to see the experiment started. But the figures submitted by the Resettlement Administration clearly demonstrate that the method of approach is wrong, that Congress must go about it in some other way.

Basically there can be no difference between the problem of housing in the country and the problem of housing in the cities. I am convinced that the only successful method which can be pursued with respect to housing for people of small income is to require a local organization of a public nature to initiate projects. The Federal Government should do as the British Government does, give grants in aid to projects of that kind, upon the ground that through that method we are providing for a better citizenship.

The British Government has very successfully undertaken widespread housing projects on that basis. The able junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has most carefully investigated that subject, and I think he will agree with me, if I make the inquiry of him, that certainly the approach made in this respect, by the Federal Government assuming all the costs with no local help at all, no local guidance, no local assistance, no local consideration of the problem, all done at the direction of someone here in Washington, is not the way to undertake housing in the United States, either rural or urban.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, all I can say to the Senator, in reply to his inquiry, is that the bill which I introduced last year, and succeeded in having passed through the Senate, did provide for local housing authorities, who were to initiate the projects, then to be aided by loans and grants by the Federal Government.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is vastly different from what the Federal Government has been doing with respect to rural resettlement. All the cash has come out of the Federal Treasury, and it is proposed to expend $91,000,000 to take care of 13,000 families. When all of the 13,000 families are furnished with homes, what effect will that have upon other millions of our rural population who are equally deserving? Such a plan will get nowhere because there will never be money enough to extend it to all who are in need of better housing.

The present program is thoroughly unsound, and I am delighted to know that the Secretary of Agriculture has stated publicly to the Senate, in the memorandum submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, that no more rural and suburban resettlement projects are to be initiated until further careful study is made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I saw the statement of the Secretary, and knowing the Secretary as I do, I am inclined to believe that if he had been before our committee he would have come to the same conclusion we reached, and I believe even if we appropriate the money, it will not be spent in furtherance of these projects.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrogate him for my own information?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have hastily examined some figures and find that there were allocated for the fiscal year 1936 to the Resettlement Administration $276,734,159, and that $158,111,168 were expended and "encumbered"—I suppose that means commitments made—to the amount of $223,154,616, or the encumbrances exceeded the allocations by $104,000,000. Are the figures which have been presented to the Senate committee corroborative of the figures which I have just indicated?

Mr. HAYDEN. The set-up of figures which the Senator has in his hand is not along the lines of the tabulations which were submitted to the House and the Senate respecting this appropriation. The Committees on Appropriations were interested in a break-down of the total figures. What the Senator has read are grand totals of expenditures for all purposes, whereas what we wanted to know and what we ascertained was that there would be, as I stated before, $58,000,000 for rural rehabilitation loans, $30,000,000 for rehabilitation grants, $35,000,000, or $49,000,000, as the case may be, for rural resettlement subsistence homestead projects, over $400,000 for submarginal land purchases, and land development on such purchases of over $5,000,000. That is where the money is to go that was appropriated by Congress in the sum of $85,000,000 at the last session, and to which the Budget estimate proposed a supplement of $80,000,000, as contained in this bill.

Mr. KING. If the figures which I have obtained from the report submitted by the Resettlement Administration are correct, I am amazed to discover that for the fiscal year 1936 more than $276,000,000 was appropriated to that organization, and that it spent $158,000,000 and made commitments for $223,000,000 more. I was wondering where the money was to be obtained from for those commitments.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is aware, of course, that there were transferred from the Works Progress Administration 250,000 persons who were sufferers from the drought, to be cared for by the Resettlement Administration. That was a load wholly unexpected, wholly unanticipated. The Resettlement Administration was compelled to use money to feed and clothe and preserve the lives of the people in great distress. That makes a vast difference in the figures compared with the estimates presented to Congress at the last session.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, an examination of the Budget shows that the estimated appropriations for the Resettlement Administration for the next year are $179,000,000 plus. So it seems we are to continue these extraordinary expenditures for another year, with the commitments which have been made and, doubtless, commitments which will be made under the authorization to which I have just referred.

I repeat what I stated yesterday, Mr. President, that I regard the Resettlement Administration as one of the most extravagant organizations under the Federal Government; and the debates which have ensued have shown such a confused situation and, to use the expression of the able chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, such a "mess" in the Administration and in the activities or lack of activities connected with it, that I have felt constrained to offer a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Resettlement Administration created by Executive Order No. 7027, dated April 30, 1935, has had transferred to it by subsequent Executive and administrative orders the property, functions, and funds of various other governmental agencies, including the land program of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, the Division of Subsistence Homesteads of the Department of the Interior, the Land Policy Section of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and the Rural Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration; and

Whereas the duties and purposes of the Resettlement Administration, as prescribed by the President, are

(a) To administer approved projects involving rural rehabilitation, relief in stricken agricultural areas, and resettlement of destitute or low-income families from rural and urban areas, including the establishment, maintenance, and operation, in such connection, of communities in rural and suburban areas;

(b) To initiate and administer a program of approved projects with respect to soil erosion, stream pollution, seacoast erosion, reforestation, forestation, flood control, and other useful projects;

(c) To make loans, as authorized under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, to finance, in whole or in part, the purchase of farm lands and necessary equipment by farmers, farm tenants, croppers, or farm laborers;

and

Whereas the Resettlement Administration has expended large sums for the claimed purpose of carrying out the various activities it has undertaken and has a large number of employees in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and

Whereas it is alleged that the expenditures in connection with many of such activities have been unwarranted and excessive and that the benefits derived from such activities have been wholly incommensurate with the expenditures made; and

Whereas it is alleged that many other projects of the Resettlement Administration are contemplated which involve further large expenditures of public funds: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of four Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized to make a full and complete investigation of the activities of the Resettlement Administration, the total amount of public funds that have been made available to it for expenditure, and the amounts actually expended for various projects, the number and salaries of its officers and employees, and its contemplated future activities and the expenditures to be made therefor. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable, but not later than July 1, 1937, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate in the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $——, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the last portion of the resolution is in the usual form, authorizing the committee to act in full committee or by subcommittee, and to employ the necessary stenographers and incur the necessary expenses incident to the investigation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator does not contemplate seeking action upon the resolution now?

Mr. KING. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution lie on the table for the moment. I shall ask that it be taken from the table in the near future and considered, or I shall expect at least that some debate will be had upon the subject, and then I shall ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

However, in the light of the discussions which have taken place in connection with the bill now before us, it seems to me that the need of a resolution of this character must be apparent to all. It seems to me that no one who has attempted to familiarize himself with the activities of the Resettlement organization can be satisfied with the progress made, with many of the expenditures made, and with the futilities which have attended many of its efforts. I feel, Mr. President, in the light of the evidence which has been presented here in the discussions, that we are justified in asking for a thorough and searching examination and investigation in regard to the past and prospective activities of this great organization.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I find myself much in accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Utah. However, a resolution of this kind cannot lie on the table. Under the Senate rules it must go to the Committee on Rules or to a standing committee having jurisdiction, and then to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, because it carries an appropriation for investigation. I make that observation in order to hasten consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I had supposed there would be no objection to the resolution lying on the table. I am familiar with the rule mentioned by the Senator from Oregon. I now withdraw the resolution for the moment, but, of course, it has been read into the RECORD, and at the appropriate time I shall reoffer it for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator for the present withdraws the resolution he has just offered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I wonder whether the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who is chairman of the Senate Committee on Printing as well as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which has the matter under discussion in charge, would mind if I asked him, in view of his wide experience and authority on matters of this sort, just exactly where in the law there is authority for the Resettlement Administration to squander public funds in preparing and issuing, under the guise of an annual report, a flamboyant prospectus of this sort [exhibiting], which would shame any get-rich-quick fake gold-mining company or fake real-estate development in the United States?

How much of the money involved in this controversy is to be spent for that sort of propaganda?

Here is another of the publications of the Resettlement Administration, dealing with "Greenbelt Town." I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona how much money involved in this controversy is to be spent on these Greenbelt or Green Bay or Greenbriar or Green-Goods towns.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have no detailed information as to just from what source the money was obtained to issue these publications. The Resettlement Administration is given authority to have printing and binding done, and no doubt out of its general appropriation the publications referred to by the Senator from Missouri were paid for.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona another question. As chairman of the Senate Committee on Printing, does the Senator know any reason on earth why the Resettlement Administration, in carrying out the duties imposed upon it by law to make an annual report of its expenditures and activities during the past year, should not conform to the ordinary practice of other Government departments and other Government bureaus, including the annual message of the President of the United States, the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the annual report of every other Government activity, so far as I know, and more or less present its report in a manner similar to that of other reports? Why should the Resettlement Administration be permitted to go out and have a report made on glazed paper which reminds one of nothing more than a get-rich-quick prospectus?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, certainly there would be a material saving to the Government if such a report was printed in the usual way. I may state, for the information of the Senator, that the Joint Committee on Printing, of which I happen to be a member, will hold a meeting tomorrow. I can assure him that after tomorrow publications of this kind will not be issued unless the proposal shall be first submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing, and if so submitted to that committee there will have to be most extraordinary reasons shown for a repetition of such character of printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 5, line 6.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I rise merely to reannounce the absence of certain Senators and the reasons therefor as stated by me on a previous roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, on page 5, line 6, proposing to strike out "$790,000,000" and inserting "$775,000,000."

Mr. BARKLEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD (when Mr. GLASS' name was called). My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. He is paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] and vote "yea." If present and voting, the Senator from Maine would vote "yea", and the Senator from California would vote "nay."

Mr. MALONEY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I have been informed, however, that if present the Senator from Delaware would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is absent because of illness; that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained on important public business; and that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

I further announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], who is absent on departmental business, is paired on this vote with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. If present, the Senator from Wyoming would vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY. I announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] are necessarily absent; and that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 42, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] is recognized for the purpose of presenting his amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to ask whether, under the unanimous-consent agreement, an amendment is in order to the particular provision which has been under discussion or whether amendments are limited entirely to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington?

I desire to offer an amendment which was discussed during the debate, reducing by $1,000,000 the total amount carried by the bill. During the debate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] stated he was not willing to amend his amendment. I wish to know now whether under the unanimous-consent agreement any amendment is limited at this time to the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The agreement was based only upon the contingency that the committee amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BYRNES. That is what I thought.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], however, has been recognized for the purpose of presenting his amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. May I ask the Senator from Washington if he will permit me to offer the amendment to which I have referred and have a vote on it and get it out of the way? My amendment would reduce by $1,000,000 the total amount carried in the bill. Would the Senator from Washington lose his right to offer his amendment if he yielded to me for that purpose?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He would not.

Mr. BYRNES. Then I ask the Senator from Washington if he will yield to me for that purpose?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 5, line 6, to strike out "$790,000,000" and insert "$789,000,000", so as to read:

RELIEF AND WORK RELIEF

To continue to provide relief and work relief as authorized in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, and subject to all the provisions thereof, $789,000,000—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands, of course, that if this amendment is adopted, the same unanimous-consent agreement will apply.

Mr. BYRNES. That is my understanding.

Mr. President, the only purpose in offering the amendment is that the committee report indicated that the committee desired a reduction of $15,000,000 in the total appropriation, $14,000,000 because of the subsistence homestead projects, and $1,000,000, as indicated by the report, in the way of a reduction in administrative expenses of the Resettlement Administration in the District of Columbia alone. Failure to adopt the amendment of the committee has defeated both items which were included by the committee in the hope of economy. I hope the Senate will adopt at least this part of the committee's recommendation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not know whether the amendment involves a practical retrenchment or not. We have had a prolonged discussion of its merits. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that the amendment may be agreed to and go to conference so that the matter may be finally determined there.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, under the circumstances the amendment will probably be adopted, but for the record I should like to state that there is nothing yet before the Senate on the part of the particular Department which is going to be affected by the appropriation, even admitting that the justice of the amendment is established. I do not know whether or not the Department can reduce the administrative expenses in the District of Columbia by this amount. It is a comparatively small matter anyway.

I think, with the debate which has taken place, the Department should take due notice, and that if it can be done they will reduce their expenditures in the District no matter what action we may take here. If we desire to reduce administrative expenses in the District of Columbia the amendment ought to say so. It does not say so. It has no legal relation to that particular point.

If the Senator from South Carolina feels that the expenses ought to be reduced and can be reduced and that the need for such action is sustained by evidence which is fairly conclusive, why does he not offer an amendment expressing the will of Congress that the expenses of the Resettlement Administration in the District of Columbia shall be reduced by $1,000,000?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the reason why the committee did not do that was because of the exceeding great difficulty in accomplishing that end in the way the Senator from Nebraska has suggested. This is a lump-sum appropriation. The amendment upon which we have just voted did not carry any specific declaration in favor of a reduction for a specific purpose. That suggestion is merely carried in the report of the committee. The committee realized it would only be persuasive upon the executive department.

That is true of the pending amendment. The committee could not well frame an amendment to provide that no part of this fund should be used for administrative expenses in the city of Washington in excess of so many dollars, because it did not want to make too rigid the restrictions upon the department. The committee believes, and I believe, that just as the report would have been persuasive upon the executive department as to the other amendment, so it will be as to this intention on the part of the Congress that there should be a reduction of at least $1,000,000 in the administrative expenses in the District of Columbia. I think the executive department would comply with that wish.

Mr. NORRIS. The executive department will undoubtedly pay the same attention to the debate that has taken place here today. I have no doubt of that. I have no doubt, if it possibly can be done, that they will reduce the administrative expenses in Washington. But they could even increase the administrative expenses, if they wanted to be technical, even though the amendment should be adopted. Unless attention is paid to the debate which has taken place, they could absolutely ignore the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. I would share the view of the Senator that they ordinarily would pay some attention to the debate, but after the debate the million dollars was restored to the bill or retained in the bill, and that would perhaps cause some official in the executive department to say, "There was debate, and after listening to the debate the majority of the Senate voted to restore the item and, therefore, is against the reduction." On the other hand, if we reduce the total amount by $1,000,000 it would be construed as an intention on the part of the Congress that there should be a reduction in the administrative expenses in the District.

Mr. NORRIS. With due respect to the Senator's judgment, I believe they would take the opposite course. In the debate no one has defended any extravagant overhead expenses in Washington. Except the Senator himself, I think none of us is familiar with just what the expenditures are. I know I am not able to satisfy myself whether or not they are too great. It may be that on investigation we would all become convinced that they are not too great.

Every Senator who has spoken has said he wants to reduce the overhead expenses if it can be done, and that he would like to reduce them if it is possible to do so. If the Department wants to be technical, its representatives could ignore the debates, it is true, but they are just as apt to pay attention to the debates which disclose that every one is in favor of a reduction of overhead expenses if it can be brought about. However, I still insist that we have no particular evidence offered to us that the administrative expenses are too great at the present time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Yesterday, during the debate, the suggestion was made that some economies necessarily would be effected by reason of merging this organization with the Department of Agriculture, or at least placing it under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture, because it seems to me that fewer administrative officials than otherwise would be required in the District of Columbia; and obviously there must be a considerable economy in the consolidation of these two organizations.

Mr. NORRIS. There ought to be. I concede that. On the other hand, there has been thrown into the lap of the Resettlement Administration any amount of business that never was intended to be there, some of which must necessarily have a great deal of overhead expense in Washington.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that during the past few months a number of persons who were on the W. P. A. rolls have been thrown over into the lap of the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Consequently, it may be necessary to increase the personnel here in Washington for the purpose of taking care of that particular group, which runs into many thousands of persons who have been shifted from W. P. A. over to Resettlement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that the $1,000,000 of proposed reduction is taken altogether out of administrative expenses in Washington, it will involve a reduction of about 20 percent, inasmuch as it has been stated that the administrative expenses here are a little over $5,000,000. It was also stated that about $30,000,000 is involved in this appropriation, or in the estimate, for grants to persons throughout the country, and about forty-five or fifty million dollars—I do not remember the exact figures—for loans to such persons. I imagine those figures were made up before the present unprecedented flood descended on the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, which I presume will involve quite an increase in the activity of the Resettlement Administration with respect to both loans and grants.

In view of that fact, I am wondering whether the proposed reduction in the overhead here in Washington will not be too great a reduction, if it shall turn out that there must be an increase in these loans due to the cause I have mentioned.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska I shall occupy about 3 minutes of the time of the Senate, and I shall then respond to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I only wish to say to the Senator from South Carolina, in conclusion, that I am in entire sympathy with what he apparently is now trying to do; but I think the Senator is acting in the dark. We have not the necessary information upon which to act, and we may cripple this work. If we reduce the overhead expenses in the city of Washington by a million dollars, I think we shall cripple it. I am afraid we shall. I expect that reduction to take place, if it can be made, without any further action by Congress, because of the unanimous opinion here that the overhead expense ought to be reduced if it can be done. Nobody, however, wishes to cripple this work. I think a reduction of $1,000,000 now would cripple it, although I am not prepared to prove that it would do so.

I do know that the work of the Resettlement Administration has been very materially increased recently, I think within 2 weeks; and I do not know but that the increase is going on every day. So far as I know, the work is continually increasing, and I do not wish to take any chance on crippling it. It seems to me the Senator from South Carolina ought not to ask us to do that.

I do not wish to appear to be opposed to what the Senator desires to accomplish; but it seems to me he is asking us to do something on which we have not sufficient light to act intelligently, and I think the same thing would be accomplished if we should say nothing about it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, during the consideration of the bill the subcommittee had the clerk of the Appropriations Committee communicate with the Resettlement Administration to ascertain the amount spent for personal services in the District of Columbia. As I stated this morning, that amount appeared to be something more than $5,000,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia. For the moment I have misplaced the memorandum containing the figures. There are more than 80 employees drawing salaries of $5,000 and over.

In the history of the various departments I know of nothing to equal it. The fact also developed that the Resettlement Administration has 2,700 employees in the District of Columbia. In the field, doing the work of resettlement throughout the country, there are 10,000 employees, and the 2,700 employees in the District of Columbia receive approximately the same compensation as the 10,000 employees out in the field—in the States, in the regional offices, and in the counties.

I will say to the Senator that that Budget was arranged sometime ago. As the Senator knows, it was presented to the President many months ago and was presented to the Congress some weeks ago. Since that time the Resettlement Administration has been merged with the Department of Agriculture.

I know what will occur unless something is done. From the history of the departments, and my observation of them during the past 25 years, I know that when the Resettlement personnel comes into the Department of Agriculture, with 80 employees drawing $5,000 and more per year and 2,700 employees drawing this unusually large amount of compensation, efforts will be made to find something for them to do if they have not it at this time under the functions of the Resettlement Administration.

Taking the expenses of the other departments of the Government, the regular and emergency departments, with the best assistance the committee has, we believed that from this expenditure of more than $5,000,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia there could be for Resettlement now, merged as it is with the Department of Agriculture, a reduction of $1,000,000 without in any way affecting the services Resettlement should administer to the country.

I will say to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] that 250,000 persons at the most will be transferred from W. P. A. to Resettlement; but again, if we are correctly advised, that is merely for the winter, and at the end of the cold weather they are to go back to W. P. A., and not to remain upon Resettlement. No argument was made that because of the transfer for the winter of this number of W. P. A. persons on relief rolls there should be any reduction in the overhead expenditure in the city of Washington.

I have not the slightest doubt that $1,500,000 could be taken out of this amount, and there would be absolutely no justification for any injury to the work of Resettlement throughout the country. We know that during the emergency immense organizations have been built up; but the emergency does not exist today to such an extent that we should not give some attention to the salaries of the employees who were placed upon the rolls of the Government during this period, in many instances without regard to the classifications existing in all the other departments.

Nobody on the Appropriations Committee wishes to hamstring in any way the activities of the Resettlement Administration. The only reason why I urge the adoption of the amendment is that the action of the Senate in defeating the Senate committee amendment ought to be construed by an official as a rejection of the proposal that there should be any mandatory reduction in the administrative expenses in the District of Columbia. I think the official would be justified in that interpretation. It is not mandatory, and if it cannot be properly done, it will not be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says a reduction is not mandatory.

Mr. BYRNES. No.

Mr. NORRIS. But, as I see the matter, it is mandatory. The amount is reduced arbitrarily by $1,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the reduction is not taken out of the overhead expenses in Washington, the officials will have to take it out of something else.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. They must reduce the total by $1,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. I must say that that is not the legal effect of the action that is proposed, and I think the Senator will agree with me. Seven hundred and ninety million dollars is given to the President for relief and work relief. There are no restrictions upon the expenditure of the $790,000,000, and the President may pay it out for administrative expenses, for P. W. A., for Resettlement, or for anything he pleases. Legally, he may allot the entire amount to administrative expenses if he shall see fit to do so. Of course, he will not do so.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. NYE. Has the committee any information concerning the number of employees with whose services the Resettlement Administration has been dispensing without regard to the pending legislation?

Mr. BYRNES. No; we have only the statement made before the committee a few days ago as to the total number, with annual compensation, as I say, of more than $5,000,000.

Mr. NYE. Is it not true that the Resettlement Administration at the present time is dispensing with the services of hundreds of employees?

Mr. BYRNES. I am not able to answer as to that. I sincerely hope so; and if it is being done, it shows that we could easily adopt the pending amendment and indicate that we are in favor of a continuation of the reduction of the personnel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, it would be an ungracious thing for me to think, let alone suggest, that any Member of the Senate does not have in his or her heart as great a desire to serve the interests of the jobless and the hungry and those rendered wretched by the flood as I have in my own heart, or the feeling which I am sure is in the hearts of the other 11 Senators who signed the amendment which is now pending and which I shall discuss.

As the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has just indicated, we now have before us a proposal to give the President $789,000,000, out of which he may earmark money for W. P. A., for Resettlement, and the allied and kindred interests arising out of the relief program. As I read the President's Budget message, it is proposed that $650,000,000 shall be employed in the relief program under W. P. A. during the next 5 months.

It would be a futile thing for me to occupy the time of the Senate in a long discussion of the needs of the unemployed, because every Senator has access to the same information to which I have access. I think every Senator is as well informed as I am, and possibly better informed, as to the needs of the unemployed and the great tragedy of unemployment which has overwhelmed us and remained with us so long.

I need not stress to the Members of the Senate the tragedy of the flood, which comes to us as an additional visitation of the wrath of Providence. I hold in my hand a clipping which indicates that there are probably a million refugees from the sections flooded by the waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi. I doubt whether one could conjure up a greater picture of human wretchedness and misery than that presented in the flood areas so devastated at this moment, and all of this comes on top of the horror and the wretchedness and the misery of unemployment, and the wretchedness and the misery of the drought, which in itself was a great tragedy. Losses have been sustained in the flood which possibly can never be recouped, and I have no doubt that we are going to be asked to pass legislation, which, of course, probably could not be done constitutionally, to reimburse the flood losses of people in the flood-stricken areas. But these are the problems which confront us today, and in the face of these conditions, it is now proposed that we vote for relief a sum which, in my judgment, is totally inadequate to meet the demands of the next few months.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say to the Senator that Mr. Harry Hopkins, W. P. A. Administrator, appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and he was asked the specific question whether or not he did not need more money and did not desire to have more money to take care of flood relief. Mr. Hopkins replied that he did not at this time, that the funds available would be sufficient, that until a considered survey could be made he could not tell what kind of a flood relief bill he would advocate, but that in the meantime, so far as food and shelter and clothing were concerned, he had sufficient money to take care of the situation fully.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have before me the testimony referred to by the Senator from Maryland. Could not that be put in the RECORD at this point?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not desire to trespass on the time of the Senator from Washington. I think that if the Senator would read it, it would be an enlightening contribution to the debate. It is not long; it occupies only half a page.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I am not challenging the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Maryland, though I mean to comment on it. I understand that Mr. Hopkins made a statement of that character, and I have in my hand a statement he gave to the press.

Mr. CONNALLY. I object to inserting the statement in the midst of the Senator's speech. Let it be put at the end of his speech. No one wants to have a Senator's speech destroyed by having such a statement put right in the middle of it.

Mr. ADAMS. I imagine the Senator from Washington can take care of that.

Mr. BONE. I have no objection to the quotation of Mr. Hopkins, because, after all, the value of my efforts here are not to be gaged by what Mr. Hopkins says or by Mr. Hopkins' own conclusions, because in the end what we do has to be measured in our own conscience; it has to be measured by the cold, hard facts.

All I am concerned with now is that 600,000 people, according to Mr. Hopkins' own statement, are going to be dropped from the relief rolls; that a great flood has overwhelmed us; and Mr. Hopkins, in the face of the flood and in the face of dropping 600,000 workers from the relief rolls, tells us that he does not need any more money. I cannot bring myself to believe that that makes sense. But it is coupled with a statement that Mr. Hopkins and the Administration will come to the Congress if, as, and when they need the money. The point is that right now they are proposing in W. P. A. to drop over half a million workers at a time when the problem of unemployment is becoming more acute, and in the face of flood conditions.

I do not desire to burden the Senate with a long discussion, because every Member of the Senate knows the facts as well as I do. It would be like carrying coals to Newcastle to argue such things to the Members of the Senate, who have heard from their own States, who have read the record. So I shall discuss only a few of the things which affect my own State. So far as the record shows Mr. Hopkins' attitude, I think we are able to draw our own conclusions as to what should be done.

Let me quote from the President's message, delivered only a short time ago. In this mesasge our Chief Executive said:

> The most far-reaching and the most inclusive problem of all is that of unemployment and the lack of economic balance, of which unemployment is at once the result and the symptom.

That is the most important question before the country, according to Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the President of the United States, and there cannot be any argument on that point at this time. That is a Banquo's ghost that shakes its gory locks at us on every highway in this country. It is a riddle put up to us, and if we fail to solve it intelligently, and if we fail to bring to bear dispassionate judgment on this matter, and fail to bring relief to suffering people until such time as they can be absorbed into private industry, we are trifling with social dynamite.

I am not overstressing the condition, or overpainting the picture. There is a very unhappy situation confronting us. The mayors of American cities have been here telling us the situation which exists in the various cities of the country. Senators are all familiar with the conditions, and of course it would be a work of supererogation to go over the situation, and I am not going to burden the Senate with such a statement.

I again desire to refer to what the President said in his message. He stated:

> The immediate question of adequate relief for the needy unemployed who are capable of performing useful work I shall discuss with the Congress during the coming months. The broader task of preventing unemployment is a matter of long-range evolutionary policy. To that we must continue to give our best thought and effort. We cannot assume that immediate industrial and commercial activity which mitigates present pressures justifies the National Government at this time in placing the unemployment problem in a filing cabinet of finished business.

It seems to me that by reducing the amount of money now we would perhaps not be putting this problem in the filing cabinet as finished business, but we would certainly be sidetracking its consideration, and saying that perhaps tomorrow, when some of the flood problem shall become so obvious to us that we cannot escape its horrible implications, another bill will be brought in and we will provide some more money.

Let us examine for a moment just what this proposed appropriation of $650,000,000 for W. P. A. means. For the half year from July 1, 1936, to December 20, 1936, for W. P. A. in the entire country there was spent a total of $1,023,000,000, so money was expended at a rate of $170,500,000 a month. With the proposed deficiency appropriation of $650,000,000 for the next 6 months, the expenditure would be at the rate of $130,000,000 a month, which is $40,000,000 a month less than we expended in the 6 months of last year; and that in the face of the fact that a cataclysmic horror has overwhelmed the entire middle section of the United States, a horror which overwhelms the people of that section at the very moment when it is proposed to reduce the expenditures for relief by $40,000,000.

I desire to refer to a statement of Mr. Hopkins which I clipped from the Washington Post of May 29, which may be the statement to which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] referred. This statement is in a newspaper story written by Mr. Albright, one of the members of the staff of the Post:

> Hopkins told the committee W. P. A. now is carrying a relief load of 2,200,000, and this will be cut further to 2,150,000 in March, to 2,000,000 in April, to 1,800,000 in May, and to 1,600,000 in June. He asked nothing in addition to the $790,000,000 carried in the bill. Senator ALVA B. ADAMS, of Colorado, chairman of the subcommittee, said he assumed another appropriation will be asked "shortly" to cover emergency flood expenditures.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. Hopkins gave the figures for the W. P. A. and relief needs as two-million-and-some-odd thousand, and then a drop to 1,600,000. Mr. Hopkins said that was not all his problem would be, but represented what the indicated trend showed it might be.

In the very next sentence Mr. Hopkins qualified that observation by the remark that, while this was the trend, drought relief, flood relief, and other factors might change that general trend. Mr. Hopkins in that quotation was answering a remark addressed to him as to what was the trend for the future; and upon the basis of his past experience he indicated that probable load for the relief agency. He did not say that that was his definite problem.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, whether or not we feel that that will be the effect, there will inevitably be presented to the country the rather curious and, I think, unhappy spectacle of providing a sum of money for W. P. A., which of necessity means depriving people of relief at a time when I think the great mass of unemployed in this country and many other folk, including myself, believe that the trend to which the Senator refers does not exist. Strange to say, so little of the unemployment problem has been solved by reabsorption of labor into industry as to be absolutely startling. We are startled by the picture presented to us today in the matter of the small amount of reemployment. It is all right to read cold figures, but the picture of the great army of unemployed, unable to get work and earn money to buy what the individuals need to eat, requires an answer here. The plight of this vast army of unemployed requires us to do one thing, and that is to provide more money. It is not a pleasant thing to have to provide more money, but I think the situation in the country calls for a cold, dispassionate handling of this question. I do not believe we can trifle with it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am thoroughly in sympathy with what the Senator from Washington has said. In fact, in the Committee on Appropriations I had expected to vote for some increase in appropriations due to flood conditions.

Let me say, in that connection, that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] asked Mr. Hopkins a question, and the following occurred:

> Senator HALE. And with the money that you get in this bill, there is no question of your having any shortage for taking care of the floods?
>
> Mr. HOPKINS. None whatever.
>
> Senator OVERTON. And the needs of other States that are not affected by the flood will not be interfered with?
>
> Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. It would simply mean that if this $790,000,000 went through, and there were no further appropriations by Congress, the money would run out sooner.
>
> Senator BYRNES. You cannot tell now what your demands will be?
>
> Mr. HOPKINS. No. Nobody can tell.
>
> Senator BYRNES. And it is best to wait and see what the situation will be?
> Mr. HOPKINS. Nobody can tell at this time what the cost is going to be. This is one of the worst floods in the history of the country.

So, as I pointed out to the Senator, when I desired to vote for an increased appropriation, Mr. Hopkins advised us not to give him any more money then. He stated that he did not need it then, but that later, when he has the whole picture before him, he may come in and ask for more money.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, if I could bring myself to view the situation as it seems to be considered by Mr. Hopkins, then the statement of Mr. Hopkins, as read by the Senator just now, would answer the question regarding the present need. But I do not believe that statement by Mr. Hopkins is correct. I do not care if Harry Hopkins said it a hundred times; the answer is presented by the cold-blooded fact that thousands of men cannot get work anywhere. They are walking the streets vainly begging for jobs. In my judgment, W. P. A. ought to provide means for a man to get a job so long as he is able and willing to work. I know what the conditions are in my State. That is why I refuse to accept the statement of Mr. Hopkins, and the country will refuse to accept it.

I urge favorable action upon my amendment not because I want the Government to spend more money but because I am interested in keeping people alive and keeping them from suffering the privations which come with abysmal poverty. I am going to repeat the proverb, "Necessity knows no law." If we continue to trifle, we in this country are going to find out what happens when necessity compels action. I hope we shall not find it out; but if we continue to trifle with this important question, I am sure that in time we shall find out what happens under the law of necessity.

Other countries have had experiences resulting from necessitous conditions. There is no such social dynamite on earth as hunger. There is nothing like hunger to make men want to make over such a system as that under which we live today. In the face of the hunger which exists, we had better not be too scrupulous in the matter of voting funds.

Let me call to the attention of the Senate the situation in my own State. We have a director of the department of public welfare in the State of Washington who is, I believe, a very conservative gentleman. I mean conservative in his approach to economic and political problems, conservative in his approach to factual propositions. He writes me, and I know he has written my colleague [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] that the department of public works in the State of Washington—a State containing 1,600,000 or 1,700,000 people—requires a quota of 40,000 jobs for February and March, in default of which several thousand people in that State will not be able to eat. They are citizens of our country. If we were to go to war tomorrow we Senators would vote to draft those men, and put uniforms on their backs, and send them out to fight and die for our country, to die to preserve our form of government. At the behest of Congress, with its fiat hanging over their heads, they would place guns on their shoulders and put uniforms on their backs and go out and fight and die. Yet today they are compelled to walk the streets of Washington's cities, deprived of even the opportunity of working so as to be able to buy something to eat! They are not even eating.

What happens when we need this quota of 40,000 jobs out there in the State of Washington? A statement concerning the situation came to me from one of the most conservative members of the State organization. At the time he wrote, our State had 28,000 jobs in W. P. A. when we needed approximately 40,000. Mr. Hopkins may repeat 10,000 times the statement which the Senator from Maryland quoted; but 12,000 people who are deprived of a chance to get a job, when they cannot get a job in private employment in the State of Washington, will find in their hearts and in their consciences the answer to Mr. Hopkins' statement.

It so happens that I am personally very fond of Mr. Hopkins. I admire him as a man, and he is a good friend of mine. I have talked to Mr. Hopkins about this situation in my own State, as doubtless have many Senators talked to Mr. Hopkins about the problems in their States. At the end of November or the first part of December last, when I presented the distressing nature of this problem in Washington, and the fact that we were having rather threatening and menacing demonstrations in places in the State of Washington, one of the chiefs of the W. P. A. told me that the heart of the matter is that they are up against a gun on the whole question of money, and that the only way out is to reduce the ranks of W. P. A. workers. That was at a time when the W. P. A. had $170,000,000 a month. Now we are proposing to reduce that amount to $140,000,000 a month.

I have before me a letter written to me by Mr. Don G. Abel, State administrator, Works Progress Administration, of Washington. I think he is a very realistic man; certainly he is not an alarmist. Don Abel is a very able lawyer, and I think a very careful administrator. He has been under criticism and fire in my State. He has been accused of "passing the buck", but it was because he had no money, because Mr. Hopkins was not supplying him with money. Of course, Mr. Hopkins could not do so, because he did not have it.

I do not know what pressure there may be on Harry Hopkins to try to curtail the appropriation. I have all the respect in the world, as I said, for Mr. Hopkins, and I admire him very much. Undoubtedly he is going to try to go along with the administration in a program of retrenchment.

Here is the statement of Mr. Abel, dated January 25, 1937:

> We now have assigned to W. P. A. jobs in the State of Washington 33,329. There are working today on W. P. A. jobs in excess of 32,000. We were directed last Saturday to cease making any further assignments, and we have ceased doing so. * * * In the course of the next 2 weeks we will probably lose 1,000 of the 33,329.
> I received a telephone call this morning from Mr. Marbury, of Mr. Niles' office, Works Progress Administration, Washington, D. C., asking me to immediately assign, as soon as they could be certified, 500 people from the drought area who are living in urban centers. I was given to understand that as soon as these people were assigned, and the picture could be clarified, we would be able to put on some more of these people.
> There are today awaiting assignment to W. P. A. jobs 2,500 people who have been certified to the W. P. A. by the State department of public welfare as being eligible, and we are unable to assign these people to jobs. Of course, there are many more people who could be certified, and the State department of public welfare is continuing their interviewing and at the present time are continuing to certify people to the W. P. A.

In recent months about 6,000 families have come into the State of Washington from the drought-stricken sections of the United States. About half of those families have gone into the urban centers, Seattle, Tacoma, and Spokane. Farmers were literally driven out of the Dakotas and the drought-stricken sections. I recall being in Montana last fall and seeing men driving cars bearing Kansas and Dakota tags, with household goods piled high in the trailers, heading west into Idaho, into Washington, into Oregon, into those evergreen States where they could find a haven of refuge. There is no way for those persons to get relief, because some of those States have provisions which require the status of citizenship before a person can get on relief, so to speak. In other words, a person must have resided in the State a year before he is eligible for relief. Those people were driven out of a land burned by a blazing sun, unable to get relief, and thousands of them are coming into the States of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho. There is no mechanism set up in the State of Washington by which that type of farmer can get help, although he is a good farmer, a typical American. Six thousand of those families came into the State of Washington, and there is no way now to help them. Yet, in the face of that encroachment into the State, in the face of that movement of these fine, high-type American citizens into the State of Washington, it is having its quota in W. P. A. cut down.

The situation is becoming aggravated instead of being solved. Mr. Hopkins may make pronouncements of the type quoted here, but certainly he is not offering even the remotest answer to the problem arising in the State of Washington. I might call the roll in the Senate and ask any Senator if he or she believes that the W. P. A. problem in his or her State is being solved by cutting down the amount of money available for W. P. A.

My State is paying old-age pensions to 29,000 persons and making grants to 12,000 dependent children. In addition, 53,000 persons, representative of 25,000 families, have been receiving direct relief. Private industry has not provided jobs for these people. The situation is critical for them, and, unless the funds for W. P. A. are increased rather than curtailed, thousands of people in the State of Washington will suffer from cold and hunger this winter.

Even last month, December, with a quota of 28,000, there were protests and petitions from individuals and organizations coming to my office, indicating that was hopelessly inadequate as a measure of protection for that great body of people out there.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it provides no answer to our problem to say to the American people that a little later on the Senate and the House of Representatives are going to vote some more money. We are going to vote some more money in the face of the greatest flood in the history of this country. Tomorrow, next week, we are going to vote some more money. We have the opportunity now in our hands to make very certain that we are going to protect these people, and, if we have in our hearts any sincere desire to protect them, now is the chance to do it. Why postpone until tomorrow the thing that lies before us now to do? We can do a good job.

If the Congress does not want to spend $1,200,000,000, there is no way on earth the Department can be compelled to spend it. Obviously a trusted executive officer under the President of the United States is not deliberately going to throw money away, and it seems to me that Congress, in the face of one of the greatest tragedies that ever overwhelmed America, a combination of drought, flood, pestilence, famine, cold, hunger, unemployment, now defaults when it fails to take advantage of the opportunity to add about $400,000,000 or thereabouts to the amount of money we offer the country as the margin of safety for the unemployed and the wretched in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys who are going to be driven from their homes. Government agencies, the Army and the W. P. A., announce that they are going to slush money into the flood-stricken area without stint. I think every Senator here, with the faintest adumbration of compassion in his heart for human suffering, wants that done; but, by the same token, I do not want the poor in my State to go hungry. I do not want the little kiddies out there to go hungry, because hunger, it makes no difference from what cause it arises, is hunger; wretchedness and misery, no matter from what cause they arise, are just as challenging, though they arise from unemployment as though they arise from floods.

I am not going to prolong this argument any further. I hope we may have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. I have no desire to embarrass anybody, but I wish to say that, in view of the statements that have been made to the Appropriations Committee in both the Senate and the House by representatives of cities who have appeared there, and by the representatives of workers' organizations who have appeared; no one need be embarrassed. The poor of this country are all too frequently inarticulate, and, for one, I am very glad to have any agency or organization of unemployed appear here, for God knows big business has been here often enough and, with dulcet tones, induced the public officials of the Government to go a long distance in writing subsidies into our laws that have enriched a little handful of men. So I am glad, for one, that the poor, who have been so inarticulate most of the time, have come here and have had the courage to present their case, I think as fully and completely, perhaps, with their limited means, as they could do so.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will not lightly pass judgment on this matter. We are dealing now with human misery. We have had presented to the poor of the country a message by a great President. It was a great appeal to a great country, and it touched the heartstrings of the American people. If I have had one, I have had a hundred men say to me, "That sort of message rings true."

The President said, "We are not going to let anybody go hungry in this country." If we let them go hungry, what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has repeated on this floor, Mr. Hopkins' statement, will rise to haunt us. I heard a statement made here during my remarks to the effect that "we have not enough money to feed the poor." It may bring a reaction that will not be happy if we do not feed the poor. They are poor through no fault of their own. I know lots of folk out West who want to work and cannot get a job, and if they ever get the idea that we are trifling with them, when, through no fault of their own they are out of work, it is not going to be a very happy circumstance for this country which we all love.

For these reasons I hope the amendment which has been sponsored by 12 Senators will receive the approval of the Senate; and I wish to say, in conclusion, that I sincerely believe, whether or not it meets the approval of those in the Senate who feel that we should now curtail and who are going to oppose any additional expenditure of money, it will meet the approval and conscience of America. Perhaps that is saying too much, but I cannot bring myself to believe that America would not approve our action in being not generous—oh, certainly we would not be generous with a billion two hundred million dollars in the face of flood and misery and poverty—but we might perhaps content ourselves with the thought that we were merely striving to be just.

On the amendment, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I merely wish to place the Senate in possession of the information which led the Committee on Appropriations, before which this amendment was presented, to act as it did.

The Senator from Maryland read a portion of the statement of Mr. Hopkins, and, in order that it may be in the RECORD for whatever it may be worth, I will read the full statement made by Mr. Hopkins before the committee when this question, together with the other matters concerning this bill, was before it.

Senator BYRNES. Have you taken into consideration any additional demands that may be made upon you as a result of the flood conditions?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; we have not, Senator.

Senator OVERTON. You expect to spend a great deal more by reason of the flood disaster than you otherwise would?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is undoubtedly going to cost a very substantial sum of money, but I cannot indicate now what it will be.

Senator OVERTON. How will that affect the allocations to States which are not affected by the flood?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is just like the drought. The 325,000 people we added last summer were added exclusively in the drought States; and, of course, the men we put to work in the flood area, and the expenditures we make and other agencies make in the flood area, will be exclusively for those States, and will come out of the total.

Senator OVERTON. We are now face to face with that disaster; and I should like to get your view as to whether it would be advisable to make an additional appropriation in order to cover that situation.

Mr. HOPKINS. In my judgment, Senator, it would not, and for this reason: At this moment we have ample powers, under various Federal statutes, to act in this area in the way we are now acting. We are doing everything today that we would do if Congress had made an appropriation immediately available to us. At some point in this picture I assume the administrative agencies will advise the Congress what this flood has cost.

Senator MCKELLAR. But you have no need for any additional funds now?

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at the moment. We have adequate powers to act.

Senator HALE. And with the money that you get in this bill, there is no question of your having any shortage for taking care of the floods?

Mr. HOPKINS. None whatever.

Senator OVERTON. And the needs of other States that are not affected by the flood will not be interfered with?

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. It would simply mean that if this $790,000,000 went through, and there were no further appropriations by Congress, the money would run out sooner.

Senator BYRNES. You cannot tell now what your demands will be?

Mr. HOPKINS. No. Nobody can tell.

Senator BYRNES. And it is best to wait and see what the situation will be?

Mr. HOPKINS. Nobody can tell at this time what the cost is going to be. This is one of the worst floods in the history of the country.

Senator HALE. Undoubtedly you will need to have further appropriations for the flood deficiency appropriations?

Mr. HOPKINS. In my judgment, we shall.

Senator ADAMS. Mr. Hopkins, you were talking partly on the flood, the extent to which moneys covered by this deficiency bill might be used for flood relief.

Mr. HOPKINS. Unless there is explicit language put in to prohibit us from doing it, there is power in the present bill to permit us to do the things that in our judgment need to be done in meeting this disaster.

That was the statement before us. We were also confronted with certain parliamentary problems. The Committee on Appropriations acts under the rules of the Senate. In order to increase an appropriation we must have one or the other of two bases upon which to work. There must either be legislative support for an added appropriation or there must be a Budget estimate. The amount we put in the bill, $790,000,000, was the Budget estimate. There was no legislative basis for us to go beyond that. So the committee was guided, first, by the statement made by Mr. Hopkins that for the immediate occasion the moneys were adequate, the powers were adequate; and, second, we were compelled to keep within the limitation placed upon us by the rules of the Senate. It was not any lack of appreciation of the gravity of the situation that led the committee to reject the amendment of the Senator from Washington and the Senators associated with him in sponsoring the amendment.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator hold there is no legislative authority for this appropriation, this relief bill, which has been continued year after year?

Mr. ADAMS. The relief bill each time fixes the amount of the appropriation. There is no legislative basis for our increasing the appropriation at this time. It is a very easy matter, if the Senate and the House desire to lay the legislative basis, to make it possible to increase the appropriation. A bill could be passed through the Congress in 24 hours. It is not quite right to endeavor to put members of the Committee on Appropriations in a position where they seem to be hard-hearted because they do not do things which they are not legally able to do.

Mr. BONE. Is it the Senator's position that the United States Senate could not even by unanimous consent, if need be, increase this amount?

Mr. ADAMS. No; that is not my position; but the Committee on Appropriations could not, and without unanimous consent neither the Senator nor I could offer an amendment to that end.

The question has not been raised, the point of order has not been made, but the Senator is perfectly well aware of the fact that the amendment does contravene the rules. By reason of the extreme gravity of the situation the point of order has not been made so that the Senate can, if it wishes, adopt the amendment and then it will go to conference with the House and there we will face the same problem.

I merely desire to say to the Senator that we have not raised the point of order against the amendment. So far as I am concerned as chairman of the subcommittee I shall not raise the point of order, though the Senator knows the point of order, if raised, would be sustained. I am not going to be made responsible for raising it. Other members of the Appropriations Committee feel the same way. It is not fair to cast that aspersion upon a committee which is supposed to live up to the rules of the body which appoints it.

Mr. BONE. The Senator will understand I am speaking for people who have no voice in this body, the unemployed. They are not concerned with the technical rules of the Senate. They are concerned with getting food for themselves and for their families. I am trying in my own way to voice the hope of that great group. I am far more concerned with them than I am with the rules of the United States Senate. If I transgress those rules by pursuing this course, I cannot help it.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator and I are both bound by the rules of the body in which we sit. There are certain definite ways our business must be done. It would have been very easy for the Senator, at the time he prepared his amendment or at the time he gave notice of it, to have introduced a bill or had one introduced in the House and passed regularly giving the Appropriations Committee of the Senate a grant of authority to make the increased appropriation.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I cannot bring myself to agree with the statement which has been made here in behalf of Mr. Hopkins that he is acting in response to a trend. The trend Mr. Hopkins talks about is a trend brought about, on the face of the figures, by the forced removal from the W. P. A. rolls of thousands of workers.

Mr. ADAMS. I think in justice to Mr. Hopkins it should be said that he has not arbitrarily cut off a W. P. A. worker. He has said that he hoped that the renewal of private employment would render it possible to make a reduction. There is no declaration, there is no policy, there is no intention on the part of Mr. Hopkins, as I understand his testimony and his statements, to make a reduction which is not justified by increased private employment. He has at all times and on all occasions said that no hungry man should go unfed in the United States.

Mr. BONE. That is precisely what will happen. Not one hungry man, but there will be many of them, and there will be many little children not fed. That is why I have raised the issue. I am not concerned merely to gratify my urge to ask someone to vote for something. I have raised the issue because I feel very keenly about this situation. I know many are suffering now and that many more will suffer. I want to prevent all that suffering, and I have no other thought in taking issue with the committee on a matter of this kind.

Mr. ADAMS. When the bill passes, as it probably will by tomorrow, there will be $790,000,000 available to Mr. Hopkins in addition to some $70,000,000 now in his hands, which can be expended, if need be, within 10 days. We are not putting a limitation upon Mr. Hopkins to meet the existing needs or needs that may arise. We are giving him in this bill a very adequate sum to meet immediate needs.

I sat with the Banking and Currency Committee today, and we provided for sending two Senators representing the flooded States to ascertain what is needed to be done in order that we may provide funds along other lines in the flooded area. Every Senator with whom I come in contact appreciates the seriousness of the situation. We are all willing that all the resources of the United States shall be used to meet the emergency in the flooded area and to meet the emergency of the hungry throughout the land.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as a point of order is going to be withheld and there will probably be a vote on the amendment——

Mr. KING. Some one of us may raise the point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Frankly, I hope the Senate will be permitted to vote on the matter on its merits. For one I appreciate the attitude of the committee in not making the point of order.

Coming from a State which probably has been hit harder than any other State in the Union by the flood in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, I realize how embarrassing it is for a Senator so situated to vote against any increase in the appropriation based upon the flood situation; because, while other arguments and other reasons are advanced for the $400,000,000 increase, it is my understanding that the amendment was prompted by the flood situation, probably growing out of a fear that the $790,000,000 would be largely depleted in administering to flood victims and to that extent would be withdrawn from other worthy projects all over the country for which this amount originally was intended.

In that connection I wish to say that at the request of Mr. Hopkins I called a conference last week of Members of both Houses from the flooded area with respect to the situation, in order that we might get first-hand information and make up our minds from that information what would be necessary or expedient to do at the moment. In addition to what he said to the Appropriations Committee, which the Senator has quoted, Mr. Hopkins stated to us in that conference, which was public—the newspapers had their representatives there and carried the story—that the passage of this bill would give him all the funds he could use for the present not only with respect to normal projects, but with respect to flood relief.

He went particularly into the question not only of rescue, but the problem of sending 65,000 employees from the W. P. A. into the flood areas for the purposes of relief and rescue, and said that as soon as the waters subside they would immediately get into what he called a clean-up campaign, and go as far as possible, even straining his technical authority, to bring relief to those people and those areas; that later on he would come to us with a request for whatever may be deemed necessary to reimburse the W. P. A. funds for normal purposes by whatever amount it had been necessary to deplete them on account of the flood; but he could not then estimate what would be necessary. We know we cannot, because the President has named him as chairman of a commission of five who are now in Memphis planning to come up the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers by steamer to make a minute investigation of the situation which he will report to the President and to the Congress later.

In view of the lack of knowledge we now possess as to whether the amount carried in this amendment will be sufficient or what amount will be required, in view of the fact that the President and Mr. Hopkins, the War Department and the Resettlement Administration, the C. C. C. and the Red Cross and all other agencies of relief and rehabilitation have assured us that every possible effort will be made and every possible dollar will be requested that is needed, it seems to me it is the part of wisdom now not to attempt to legislate in advance when we do not know what the requirements will be.

Much as I dislike to have to vote against an amendment proposing an increase which might affect my own State, my own home city, out of which 40,000 people have been driven and which today is under from 4 to 16 feet of water and the entire population evacuated, I have enough confidence in the administration and the relief agencies to believe that whatever is needed will be requested and provided by Congress when the requisite information is obtained. I do not believe it is the part of wisdom to act now without that needed information.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I may say in response to the Senator from Kentucky that what I want to avoid and the purpose of my argument was to avoid the robbing of the average W. P. A. worker who needs a job of the hope and opportunity of getting a job now in order to give all necessary relief to the people in the flood-stricken area as pictured by the Senator from Kentucky. God knows I have no desire to keep help from going to Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, and other sections which have been devastated by the flood; but, by that very token, I do not want the W. P. A. worker in New York or Seattle or San Francisco or some other place to be deprived of the only hope he has of living and getting something to eat and protecting and caring for his family. I am fearful that is precisely what may happen.

The W. P. A. is laying off men in my State. I do not presume to speak for any other State, but I may say to the Senator from Colorado and other Senators that in the State of Washington men are being laid off, and apparently there is no hope of getting more money; and Mr. Hopkins is very frank in saying that he cannot and will not supply the amount of money which the relief agencies in my State say is necessary to be supplied to meet that demand. Persons over 65 years of age in the State of Washington are being laid off on the theory that they can get old-age pensions, and yet the State is not able to supply the money for pensions for them. We are laying off single persons in the State of Washington, and yet even a single man or a single woman has to eat. A man may not "live by bread alone", but it is obvious that if he cannot eat there is going to be trouble for him.

That problem confronts us. These people are going off the relief rolls, and there are no jobs for them. If they could find jobs in private employment, I should not be lifting my voice in the Senate in favor of this amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, part of the matter suggested by the Senator from Washington is a matter of the exercise of the judgment of the relief officials. As to the money situation, there has been a reduction in amount. Men have been laid off in various places; but this bill is for the purpose of replenishing that very fund. I come from a part of the country where $790,000,000 looks like a great deal of money, and it looks as if it would do a great deal of good; but so far as the flood is concerned, I will say that the $400,000,000 proposed to be added by the Senator's amendment will be a relatively small contribution to the amount that will have to be provided to care for the flood situation. We shall have emergency deficiency bills before us, and before us with reasonable promptness.

Mr. BONE. May I ask the Senator if his committee feels that a reduction of $40,000,000 a month over the period of the next 5 months is wholly justified—that that inference may be drawn from Mr. Hopkins' statement?

Mr. ADAMS. In the first place, the committee does not know that there is going to be such a reduction. In the next place, the committee is not in position to pass on it. The committee merely had before it the statement of Mr. Hopkins that there are now a certain number of persons in need of relief who are being taken care of, and that when the winter passes and employment opens in various industries and on the farms, he hopes that he may be able to make a progressive diminution in the number who must be helped. He did not make the arbitrary statement that he was going to cut off 200,000, 400,000, or 600,000, but he hoped that returning prosperity and returning employment would make that possible.

Of course the Senator from Washington, like every other Senator, is eager to have every possible man transferred from public help into private employment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I ask the Senator to turn to page 92 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the statement by Acting Budget Director Bell, in which he said, down at the bottom of the page:

> That money has been allocated from month to month to various agencies, including the Works Progress, Resettlement Administration, Treasury Department, or administration of the accounting and disbursing agencies. Now, we could not allot enough money at the beginning of the year to run any agency through the 12 months, because we wanted to hold back a reserve. First, we had a drought facing us; we had a winter coming on; we did not know what it was going to be; and now you have got a flood situation in front of you.

I should like to present this thought to the Senator from Colorado: The Senator has just said that probably more than $400,000,000 will necessarily be appropriated to take care of flood relief; so, while we frankly confess so far as we are concerned that the figure of $400,000,000 is an estimate or a guess, the Senator now says he thinks the amount needed will probably be more than that. It has been my experience and it is my opinion that this policy of month-to-month allocation to the Works Progress Administration is not only inhuman so far as individuals are concerned but is impractical and extravagant so far as the Government is concerned. Every time I have presented an argument to the Works Progress Administration asking for some project which I thought was of particular value, something that would add to the wealth of the community, the answer I have had was, "We cannot start that project because we have our money only from month to month. We do not know how much we are going to get next month, and if we start this worth-while project, it will take 6 or 8 months to complete it, and perhaps we shall have to abandon the project in the middle of it." I have seen the officials abandon worth-while projects in the middle and waste the amount of money they have expended.

Looking at the matter from the personal point of view, the reason why we have work relief as compared with straight relief or the dole is that we try to keep people busy, to keep them at work, to keep up their morale. Nothing can destroy the morale of an individual so much as being at work one month, out of work the next month, and then back at work the next month. Since we know that we are going to have to appropriate, before the 30th of June, somewhere around $400,000,000, it seems to me that, to be consistent with the purpose of the work-relief program and to enable the Works Progress Administration to start projects which are worth something to the several communities, we certainly should not hesitate to make this additional appropriation at this time.

What I am afraid of—and I am sure that is what my colleague [Mr. BONE] is afraid of—is that the authorities will take money for flood relief from this fund, as they certainly have indicated they intend to do. There is no question about that. That will mean that at no time between now and the 30th of June will the Works Progress Administration know how much money it is going to have; and it will mean that we shall continue to do as we have done in the past 6 months, since the drought condition arose in the Middle West, and money for its relief was taken from this source. We shall continue with a program of mere leaf-raking operations, wasting the money of the Government, and breaking down the morale of those who are receiving work relief.

I realize that it is hard to assume the responsibility of saying that some money may be saved by adding $400,000,000 to an appropriation. It is quite a burden to undertake an argument of that kind; but if we should appropriate at the beginning of the year enough money to take care of our needs, while we might spend a little more money, I sincerely believe that when we were through we should get something for the money, instead of having it wasted as has very largely been done under the program of the Works Progress Administration during the past 6 months.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator, of course, understands that the Senate and the Congress of the United States have not fixed the policies of the Works Progress Administration. We have merely provided vast sums of money practically without limitation or restraint. The last appropriation was $1,425,000, turned over to the President without restraint. Back of that was a similar appropriation of $4,800,000,000. Back of that were other funds; and we, as legislators, have not attempted to prescribe the rules or the methods by which the money was to be expended. In other words, the criticisms which the Senator makes may be well founded, or they may not be; but they are not properly to be directed at the Senate.

The other problem is the legislative procedural problem.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. In the light of the fact that we know money is to be taken from this fund in the same way that it was taken from the fund for drought relief last summer, are we not certain that if we appropriate only $790,000,000 precisely the same condition is going to exist that was described by Acting Director Bell in his testimony before the Senate committee?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; but I desire to ask the Senator a question: Why put the matter in the form in which the Senator's amendment puts it? Why put it before the Senate, when it belongs, first, before the Budget Director and the President, and, following that, before the House, rather than having it presented to the Senate, which has its limitations of rules and its limitations of statutes? Why put the problem up to us when we really cannot handle it?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The answer to that question is that we have no way of getting an item of appropriation into the Budget, and we have no way of getting it before the House. This is the only place where we are allowed to stand and propose appropriations.

Mr. ADAMS. I assume that the Senator from Washington has a great deal of influence over in the House. I know that is true; and certainly the problem itself has.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ADAMS. Gladly.

Mr. BONE. When representations were made by those of us in Congress to the Works Progress Administration last fall concerning this matter of cutting off allowances to the State of Washington we were assured that the inability to give the State the necessary amount of money was due to the fact that some 20 States were in the drought area and it was necessary to assist persons in that area who were in desperate straits. Therefore the money was diverted into the drought-stricken sections.

In my judgment that is precisely what is going to happen here, because the heart of everybody in the city of Washington has been touched by this terrible flood situation. The $650,000,000 which will be allocated under this bill to W. P. A., as the President has indicated, will simply be drawn on very freely to help the flood sufferers. Obviously, with $650,000,000 divided by 5, we have $130,000,000 a month; and if that $130,000,000 is drawn on to help the flood sufferers, I do not know what is going to happen. Mr. Hopkins will not have any money for the usual W. P. A. activities, and will have to be back here in 2 weeks' time getting more money.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has not observed any reluctance on the part of the Administration to ask for money, has he?

Mr. BONE. No; but I observe very definite reluctance on the part of the Administration to increase the Budget now when it has a chance. Perhaps the Senator and I do not understand the meaning of the word "reluctance." The meaning of the term "reluctance" may be a matter of disagreement. I do not know.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Has not the criticism been from various sources—Democrats as well as Republicans—that the President and the Administration have been rather too prodigal in advancing funds for relief? It seems to me, in view of the alacrity with which the Administration has responded to the requests of the people whenever immediate relief has been required, that we have a promise that we will get whatever is necessary to meet the needs of the people

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, just one word. I took the floor in order to make clear to the Senate the position of the Committee on Appropriations and also to endeavor to make it as clear as I could that some Members of the Senate who might find it necessary by reason of the parliamentary procedure to vote against the amendment should not in fairness be charged with opposition to adequate appropriations for these great needs.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I may add, merely for the sake of making the record plain to everyone, that certainly in my own heart I absolve the Senator from Colorado and the other members of his committee from any personal responsibility. I would not desire to have the inference go out that anyone has been unjust. I fully realize, as every other Member of this body realizes, the implications of the parliamentary situation; and if I have said anything which might imply that any Senator has been unjust, I desire to withdraw the implication. I merely said what I did say because there was in my heart a very sincere desire to help and a deep feeling that it is highly necessary to assist now; but that does not reflect in any degree on the committee which had the bill in charge. I understand fully the position of the Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. Of course the rules were made before the Senator and I came here.

Mr. BONE. I understand that, and I am sure the Senator knows I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

Mr. BONE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his suggestion, before the roll is called I should like to make a statement. Unquestionably the flood emergency which is now upon a large part of the country has increased the necessity for relief expenditures. It has also emphasized the importance of proceeding as speedily as possible with the consummation of a national plan for flood control.

So far as I am informed—and I think I am pretty well advised on the subject—every possible effort that can be made within reason is being put forth now through the Red Cross, agencies of the War Department, the W. P. A., and voluntary associations, to make provision for the immediate necessities of persons who have been driven from their homes and who are in need of assistance because of the extraordinary flood which is now occurring.

There is no intention or purpose that efforts in that particular shall be abated or discontinued. Undoubtedly enormous amounts will be added to the program of relief because of the flood, but it is respectfully submitted that all the agencies of the Government which have worked in connection with the immediate problem of flood relief are now making a study of what is occurring, of what may be anticipated, and also of what may be required.

In view of these facts, and the further fact that no amounts at this time in addition to the aggregate amount carried in the pending bill have been asked or are justified, it is my personal opinion that the Congress may well await further information upon the subject before authorizing additional funds, with the full realization of the fact that we, as well as other agencies of the Government, are ready to give quick response to necessities as they arise.

In all probability the present session of Congress—though I do not wish to be regarded as entering the realm of prophecy—will continue until sometime near the end of the present fiscal year, and ample opportunity will be afforded to make such further provision as may be necessary to provide adequate relief. For that reason, and with that assurance, I do not feel that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington is at this time necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. May we expect a report from the special committee studying flood matters before Congress shall adjourn?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Administrator of W. P. A., the Chief of Engineers, Red Cross representatives, and representatives of other relief agencies of the Government within the last 3 days have gone to the center of the flood trouble and are now studying the situation there. Unquestionably the task to which we have set ourselves will not be completed when occupants of flooded regions liable to be devastated have been withdrawn or removed to places of safety. There will be necessary a process of rehabilitation in order to make it possible for citizens to resume the occupancy of their former homes and to go on with life. But we have no detailed information on that subject now.

In reply to the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania, undoubtedly full information will be made available as it is obtained, and quick response may be expected from agencies of the Government, including the Congress, when the information shall become available.

I would have no feeling or assurance that in adding to the amount carried in the pending bill at this time, either the sum proposed by the Senator from Washington or any other sum which might be suggested, we would be meeting the standard of service which it will be necessary to meet in the final discharge of our duty.

We have before us a deficiency bill. The funds carried are adequate for present purposes, and no relief activities which are really vital and necessary will be discontinued until the opportunity shall have been afforded to take up the subject further and deal with it in the light of information that is necessary in order to enable us to determine intelligently the problems arising.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that so many Senators are now in the Chamber, I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) to create a Joint Congressional Committee on Government Organization, and it was signed by the Vice President.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend by striking from line 22 on page 14 of the pending bill the words "is equal to" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "represents each land bank's share of the net loss to the Farm Credit Administration, by reason of", so as to read:

Payments to Federal land banks on account of reductions in interest rate on mortgages: For an additional amount for payments to each Federal land bank of such amount as represents each land bank's share of the net loss to the Farm Credit Administration, by reason of the amount by which interest payments on mortgages held by such bank have been reduced during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph "Twelfth" of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, to supplement the amount made available for this purpose for the fiscal year 1937 in one fund by the "First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936", $6,000,000.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I have submitted this amendment in substantially the same form to the chairman of the subcommittee, and I believe he agrees to the need for the amendment. The $6,000,000 made available by the bill as an appropriation is to cover the possible losses to Federal land banks because of the reduction in mortgage interest that was provided for by a law enacted during the Seventy-fourth Congress. As drawn, the language provides that the sum to be paid shall be equal to the amount of the interest reduction, whether or not such loss is suffered by the Federal land banks. The amendment I have offered is designed to make this sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, available to meet the actual net loss which the land banks have suffered because of the interest reduction, instead of appropriating the entire sum.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I believe the language suggested by the Senator from Iowa meets the purposes of the appropriation more accurately than the language in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 10, after the word "appropriation", it is proposed to strike out the rest of the proviso down to and including the word "thereof" in line 16 and in lieu thereof to insert: "or of any appropriation for any executive department or independent executive agency shall be used hereafter to pay the compensation of any person detailed or loaned for service in connection with any investigation or inquiry undertaken by any committee of either House of Congress under special resolutions thereof, unless the department, agency, or establishment from whose staff such person is detailed or loaned shall render to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives (according as the Senate or the House of Representatives shall have ordered such investigation or inquiry) a statement on or before the 10th day of each month of the number, grade, or status, and monthly compensation of the persons so detailed or loaned from the staff of such department, agency, or establishment during the preceding calendar month."

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, as this bill passed the House, and as the Committee on Appropriations has reported it to the Senate, it contained on page 5 a provision prohibiting the use of certain governmental employees by investigating committees of the House and of the Senate.

During the past week there has been a considerable amount of discussion and controversy as to whether or not that provision as it has been reported should be included in the bill. I have discussed the question with Senators who believe there should be some inhibition against the employment of employees of governmental departments by committees of the House and of the Senate. I did not find any objection to the use of the employees themselves. I did not find any particular criticism of the investigating work which is being carried on by committees of either House at the present time. However, I did find two arguments were used.

One of the arguments was that without some check being placed upon committees, and some report being required from the committees or the governmental agency, it would not be possible for the Senate to know how much its committees were actually spending upon investigations; and a committee might obtain $50,000 from the Senate and then by the use of other employees actually spend $150,000.

The second argument which was used was that the departments, in asking for appropriations, have gotten into the habit of attempting to justify larger appropriations than are actually justified by saying, "Oh, the Senate committee or the House committee asked us for certain assistance, and it has cost us a certain amount of money."

It seemed to me that both those objections could be very simply met; and, as the result, in conjunction with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], I prepared the pending amendment. It simply provides that when a Senate committee or a House committee uses employees of a Government department, the department must report to the Secretary of the Senate or to the Clerk of the House on the 10th day of each month as to the number of employees used during the previous month, the amount of time they spent in working for the committee, and the amount of their salaries that should be allocated against the committee. I submitted the amendment, I believe, to everyone who was particularly interested on either side of the question, and I believe the amendment meets with the approval of those on each side.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] has said, there has been quite a controversy as to this particular proviso in the bill. Many different views have been expressed concerning it. However, the Senator has correctly stated that, so far as I am personally concerned, the amendment he has offered meets with my approval; and I hope the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] and the other members of the committee can see fit to accept the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. It is acceptable, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, the proposed amendment meets with my entire approval. I feel that the Senate of the United States should know the employees of various departments who are being used by Senate committees, and what the use of such outside persons by Senate committees is costing the Government.

The subcommittee of the Senate committee of which I am chairman has been somewhat the subject of the controversy in question; and for that reason I desire to call attention to the fact that, as I introduced the resolution under which the subcommittee finally held hearings, in the first instance it did not have a provision suggesting that we should call upon the Government departments for help. That provision was inserted in the resolution by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. There seemed to me to be some misunderstanding with reference to that. There was some feeling that the resolution contained no such provision, and that the committee was asking for help from the departments without any authorization from the Senate. So, I repeat, that when the resolution was introduced in the Senate, and as reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, it contained no provision directing the committee to call upon the various departments for help; but when the resolution came back from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate it contained the provision expressly directing the Committee on Interstate Commerce to call upon the Government departments for assistance, and directing the departments to assist in every possible way, shape, and form.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Irrespective of whether or not a particular resolution authorizing an investigation contains authority to call on the departments for assistance, does not the Senator from Montana think it should be considered proper for a committee so to do?

I have in mind an instance that happened during the session before the last, when a resolution was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] calling for the appointment of a special committee, as I recall, to investigate the N. R. A. On motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] it was provided that the investigation should be made by the Committee on Finance, a standing committee of this body; and the investigation was conducted by the Committee on Finance—not by a subcommittee, but by the whole committee—without asking for any appropriation or any allocation from the contingent fund of the Senate, without employment of any special assistants or special counsel. However, during the course of the investigation, which covered quite a long period, we had several counsel of the Federal Trade Commission helping the committee, and three or four of their experts helped in collating the facts and assisted us in the investigation. It seems to me that without any specific authorization in the resolution directing us to conduct the investigation, it was entirely proper for the Committee on Finance to call on the Federal Trade Commission for such assistance.

Mr. WHEELER. I thoroughly agree with what the Senator from Missouri has said. For example, during the Teapot Dome investigation my late colleague, Senator Walsh, used men who were assigned to him from the Department of the Interior to help in the conduct of that investigation, and others were assigned from other departments to help him.

When I conducted the investigation into the Department of Justice, I did not use any men from the Department of Justice—they were not assigned to me—but I did use men from other branches of the Government service in the conduct of that investigation.

When the late Senator Couzens, of Michigan, investigated the Treasury Department, men were loaned to him by various departments for the purpose of helping him conduct that investigation.

When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, under the chairmanship of Mr. RAYBURN, now majority leader, conducted its important investigation, the Interstate Commerce Commission did practically all of the work. As a matter of fact, the investigation was turned over to the Commission, and practically the entire work of the committee was done by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that the House committee did not do its duty, but turned it over to somebody else to perform?

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. In effect, the Senator said that. He said the work was turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Commission did all the work.

Mr. WHEELER. If I made that statement, it was erroneous.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suggest to the Senator that he should not reflect upon the Members of another body by a statement made here.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not intend in the slightest degree to reflect upon the House or any Member thereof. As a matter of fact, I think the leader of the House who conducted the hearing did an excellent piece of work. I commend him most highly for the work he did in that connection, and I also commend Commissioner Splawn, who assisted him; and those in the Interstate Commerce Commission who assisted the present House leader did a most excellent piece of work.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very glad to hear that fine tribute to the State of Texas.

Mr. WHEELER. I certainly meant to commend and give my tribute to Representative RAYBURN and to Mr. Splawn.

Mr. CONNALLY. That was exactly what the Senator from Texas had in mind, that the committee had done its duty under the leadership of my friend and former colleague.

Mr. WHEELER. They did a most excellent piece of work, and I commend them most highly for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to say to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that in the investigation conducted by the House committee there was of necessity a great deal of informal investigation and checking up of records which could best be done by employees and representatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission. To that extent the employees, the officers, the agents, and examiners of the Interstate Commerce Commission did that work, and they did it not out in the open, in any public hearing, but they went through all the records in order to collate the facts necessary for the chairman to bring out in the public investigation and hearing.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. The same thing is happening with respect to the committee of which the Senator from Montana is chairman under a resolution submitted by him. That resolution specifically provided that the Coordinator of Railroads, Commissioner Eastman, should decide what railroads were to be investigated and what financial transactions of the railroads should be looked into, and very largely the decision was based on information within the possession of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I have the word of members of that Commission, and others who have worked and collaborated with it, that, while the Commission has loaned and furnished the subcommittee a number of their examiners, because of the lack of authority on the part of the Commission to do certain things or to go into certain offices and examine certain files, the result of their work with the subcommittee has been as valuable to the Commission as it has been to the committee of the Senate. It seems to me there ought not, for any reason, arise any lack of willingness on the part of the legislative branch of the Government and the executive branch of the Government to cooperate fully in the revelation of evils that may exist anywhere in the financial institutions of the United States and that may affect the welfare of the American people.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I have a letter from Commissioner Eastman, but before referring to the letter I wish to explain to the Senate that when the resolution was submitted we had quite extended hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee as to whether or not an investigation was necessary. We called before the full Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate Jesse Jones, the Chairman of the R. F. C.; we called before the committee Mr. Eastman and other members of the Interstate Commerce Commission; we called before the committee such men as Charles A. Beard. They came before us and testified to the necessity of the investigation because of certain things which they had discovered in the financial practices and reorganization of some of the railroads. Then, after the resolution passed the scrutiny of the full Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, it went to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and again an unprecedented thing took place. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate called before it—whom? If I am not mistaken, they called before it Jesse Jones; I know they called before it Mr. Eastman, the Coordinator of Railroad Transportation of the country; and they called before it Mr. Joseph P. Kennedy, who was at that time Chairman of the Securities Exchange Commission, who testified to the necessity of carrying on this kind of an investigation by the Senate of the United States.

Then the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate modified the resolution and directed, as a matter of fact, that the Coordinator of Transportation should undertake to point out the railroads that should be investigated and the financial structures that should be investigated. Secondly, the committee modified the resolution by providing that we should call upon the various departments for help and assistance.

I then appointed an attorney for the committee, Mr. Max Lowenthall, who is an outstanding lawyer and familiar with this kind of work. He came down here and devoted his time and attention to the work, and, as a matter of fact, has been working for $300 a month, when I am here to say that Max Lowenthall could not be hired in the ordinary course of business for several times that amount of money. He had retired from the practice of law, but he had devoted some time and attention to the matter of the reorganization of railroads when he was practicing law, and he knows a great deal about the subject. He gathered around him a group of young men who have worked night and day, many times they have worked all night and all day, looking into these financial transactions. I give credit where credit is due when I say to the Senate that I think they have done one of the finest jobs that any group of young men has ever done in uncovering some of the evils incident to the financing of the railroads of the country.

I wish to call attention to the fact that the number of railroads to be investigated was not designated by me, but was designated by Mr. Eastman. There was a list totaling 25 major railroad systems, which included more than 35 major railroads, and, in addition to that, holding companies which control some of the railroads. Half the railroads on the list and a number of railroad holding companies went into receivership or bankruptcy. The railroad systems on the list, excluding the holding companies, operate 95,000 miles, or approximately 20 percent of the total mileage of the country. They have book assets of approximately $10,000,000,000.

I also wish to call attention to the fact that the Government of the United States has loaned these railroads $600,000,000; $400,000,000 are owed by the railroads of the country at the present time to the R. F. C., and $200,000,000 have been loaned by the Public Works Administration; so there is a total of $600,000,000 which has been loaned to the railroads by the Government of the United States.

We have uncovered evidence of fraud in matter of getting these loans from the Government of the United States which if it had been uncovered earlier the Government would not have made the loans; it would not have dared to make them. It made some of the loans to the Van Sweringen group upon false and fictitious statements. I am not going through the entire list, but we uncovered the circumstance that by means of holding companies the president of one of the great railroad systems and a financial expert were keeping false records without even knowing the records were false. Upon that false bookkeeping, and upon those false records, they obtained loans from the Government of the United States. When finally evidence of it was discovered, it was sent to the Department of Justice, and a report came back that the statute of limitations had run against the transaction, and so nothing could be done. We found, for instance, cases where by means of holding companies some of the largest rebates which the general public understood had been stopped have been continued and are being continued by devious ways at the present time. We have discovered, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that some of the rich railroads have been milked to the advantage of some other railroads in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. When will there probably be a report of the findings of the committee?

Mr. WHEELER. I can say to the Senator that in the not distant future I want to bring in a report setting forth some of the findings of the committee. We have not, however, concluded the investigation, and the only thing that worries me about it is that it has been such a stupendous task that when we have gone into one phase we have opened up other phases which ought to be investigated.

Let me show what happened in reference to some of the holding companies, particularly in the case of the Alleghany Corporation, in connection with which the Mid-America Co., which is owned by Mr. Ball, who made his money out of manufacturing glass jars, came into the possession of 23,000 miles of railroad. Mr. Ball controls 23,000 miles of railroad; that is, he has it in his power to control them through the control of Mid-America. He bought that control for $274,000, according to the books of his own company. In other words, he bought the controlling stock of the Alleghany Corporation, which in turn controls the Erie Railroad, which controls the Nickel Plate, which controls the Missouri Pacific, and other vast companies in the Southwest. It controls the Wheeling & West Virginia road; it controls the Chesapeake & Ohio; it controls the Nickel Plate and numerous other companies.

It controls mining companies, peach orchards, trucking companies, a retail coal company in New Hampshire, and a coal mine in Wyoming. In addition to 23,000 miles of railroads, it controls almost every conceivable kind of business—retail stores, hotels, real-estate concerns, trucking outfits, fruit shops, all jumbled into one holding company.

It has taken from the public of the United States in the sale of securities, if I am not mistaken in my recollection, in the neighborhood of $3,000,000,000. It sold the securities to the general public, and within a very short time the securities became practically worthless. We have gone into the whole unsavory story of how the railroads were being mulcted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, were those securities issued by authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. WHEELER. No. As a matter of fact, there was a general feeling upon the part of the public, when we enacted the law a few years ago giving the Interstate Commerce Commission some power over holding companies, that we were solving the difficulty. However, when we came to examine that law it was found that it did not apply as we had hoped. As it was introduced into the Congress it was thought it would apply to the Alleghany Corporation. As it was finally passed by the Congress it did not touch the Alleghany Corporation at all. The Alleghany Corporation was eliminated from the provisions of the law and it only affected future holding companies.

Mr. WALSH. The securities to which the Senator refers, that were issued under unfavorable conditions, were of the holding companies rather than the railroad companies?

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the investigation disclose any such condition in the issuance of securities by the railroads as and of themselves?

Mr. WHEELER. No; not by an operating company. Their securities are submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for validation.

As a matter of fact, while there is some dispute at the present time as to whether new holding companies would have to submit their securities, I am of the opinion—though some of the Interstate Commerce Commission lawyers take the opposite view—that if a case should arise a holding company organized tomorrow under certain conditions would not have to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission to have its securities validated at all. The law provides, as I recall it off-hand, "any holding company which in the future obtains control over two or more great railroad companies", and so forth. Here, for instance, is the Mid-America Corporation. Mid-America is not acquiring new control over railroads. It is only taking over the majority stock of the Alleghany Corporation, which in turn controls the various railroads.

One of the amazing things about it is that there will be found in Mid-America as little as three-tenths of 1 percent of the investment in some of the railroads controlling the entire investment in the railroads. I repeat that—as little as three-tenths of 1 percent invested in Mid-America Corporation controls the investment in some of the operating companies.

Mr. McKELLAR. How can that happen?

Mr. WHEELER. It happens because there is a pyramiding of holding companies. They are issuing bonds and preferred stock with no voting rights. The holding companies are pyramided one on top of the other, with bonds and preferred stock and a little common stock controlling the majority of the operating companies. Securities are issued one after the other, until finally, as the evidence shows beyond a question of doubt, as little as three-tenths of 1 percent invested in a holding company controls the entire railroad company.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does not make that clear, I am afraid. What he means is an amount equal to three-tenths of 1 percent of the total property invested in Mid-America, which has a small capitalization, of course, results in giving control over a vast railroad system. Is not that what he means?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is not what the Senator said.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator for correcting me

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to take too much time of the Senate about this matter. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator think it extremely probable that exactly such information as he has just related to the Senate as having been produced before his committee may furnish a very reasonable explanation for the public clamor which has been started in the newspapers and one place and another against the employment by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate of certain Federal employees? It seems to me the fact that the committee has been getting at the root of this matter, has been drawing blood, and has been carrying out to the fullest extent the purposes for which the investigation was ordered by this body, may be a full, adequate and complete explanation for all the clamor against the employment of experts from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WHEELER. I know that some of the railroads and particularly some of the holding companies have been agitating against the use of employees of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under the present law the Interstate Commerce Commission has been helpless to go into some of these matters because they have had no authority and no power to go into the holding companies, and no authority and no power to go into the banks and examine some of the records.

I will relate one of the most startling things we have come across. A great expert of the New York Stock Exchange is a man by the name of Hoxsey, who is, I believe, an exceedingly able individual and an exceedingly honest individual. We find in memoranda in 1926 that as their expert—and they all concede he is one of the greatest experts in the United States—he advised the New York Stock Exchange and its listing committee of the evils of holding companies, and particularly denounced holding companies of utilities. While he was speaking only of utilities, yet he stated upon the stand before the committee that the same rule would apply to the holding companies of railroads.

Mr. Hoxsey not only denounced railroad holding companies from the standpoint that they were unsafe from a financial standpoint and an economic standpoint, but he pointed out with the greatest of clarity their abuses and their unsafeness from a social and a political and every other standpoint. It is really one of the most amazing and one of the most enlightening articles and memoranda upon the subject that I have seen anywhere. Mr. Hoxsey stated that if he had had his way he never would have voted to list Alleghany stock, by which the public was mulcted out of millions upon millions of dollars.

I appreciate the fact that when attention was called to this matter in the House, an intimation was made that we had used a number of the examiners of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is true. Mr. McGinty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, prepared a tabulation which showed that the use of these employees ran into a large amount of money; but Mr. Eastman points out in his letter that the work we have been doing is of untold value to the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. As a matter of fact, he says:

> While this has lessened the routine work of the Bureau, I believe, and we have so reported to Congress that the work which these accountants have been and are doing under Senate Resolution 71 is of great general value and also of special value to the Commission in the regulation of railroads, including the regulation of their accounting.

Then Mr. Eastman further discusses the subject in a long letter, in the course of which he says:

> If Senate Resolution 71 had not been passed, no doubt we would have gone on endeavoring to perform all of our accounting functions to the best of our ability with the staff available. The effect of the resolution has been to decrease the amount of work done under the function numbered (2) above, i. e., general-accounting examinations, and to increase the amount done under function (3), i. e., special investigations, which are going particularly into the financial affairs of the carriers. In other words, we are, for the time being, concentrating on a more or less specialized matter, with lessening of the more routine work of policing the accounts.
> Both of these duties are important and ought to be performed. However, this special inquiry into financial affairs I welcome, because it is a field which we have not sufficiently explored, since 1918, for the reasons which I have already given, and which it was particularly desirable to explore because of the growth of holding-company operations affecting railroads in recent years. An investigation of these holding-company activities was made a few years ago by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and our accountants assisted in that investigation, which was ably conducted and of very great value.

Then Mr. Eastman goes on to state, in two or three pages, the benefits which are accruing to the Interstate Commerce Commission from this investigation. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the entire letter, but ask unanimous consent to have it placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 1, 1937.

HON. B. K. WHEELER,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This letter is written in my capacity as the member of the Interstate Commerce Commission to whom its Bureau of Accounts reports. As fully set forth in the annual reports of the Commission to Congress for the years 1935 and 1936, accountants of that Bureau have, since July 1935 been used to assist your Committee in the investigation authorized by Senate Resolution 71, and in 1936 this work absorbed the services of about one-half of the force available for field work. While this has lessened the routine work of the Bureau, I believe, and we have so reported to Congress, that the work which these accountants have been and are doing under Senate Resolution 71 is of great general value and also of special value to the Commission in the regulation of railroads, including the regulation of their accounting. To make the situation clear, it will be necessary for me to recite a little history.

The normal functions of the Bureau of Accounts are three:

1. To prescribe and revise from time to time uniform systems of accounts for all classes of carriers under our jurisdiction.

2. To enforce these systems of accounts by test examinations and inspections from time to time, inasmuch as no system of accounts, however well devised, is self-enforcing or will produce reliable results without some degree of policing.

3. To make such special accounting examinations from time to time as our duties in the regulation of rates and charges and in securing adequate information in regard to the management and business of the carriers may require.

These three purposes were all clearly understood and recognized in 1906, when the Commission was first given adequate authority over railroad accounting, as is evidenced by the reports and debates of that period. Beginning with about 1918, however, the activities of the Bureau were largely diverted from its normal functions to special and extraordinary duties. These were:

(a) To determine for each rail carrier or system, through an audit of income accounts, the average annual railway operating income for a test period of 3 years, otherwise known as the "standard return", which formed the basis of the compensation paid by the Government for the use of the railroad properties during the period of Federal control.

(b) To determine, through a similar audit, the amounts of net railway operating income guaranteed to carriers under sections 204 and 209 of the Transportation Act, 1920.

(c) To determine, through a similar audit, the correct net railway operating income of carriers as one of several factors in arriving at recapturable excess income under the provisions of section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act.

These special duties engrossed much of the attention of the Bureau until 1933, when the recapture provisions of section 15a were repealed. Incidentally, the amount saved to the Government by our audits under (a) and (b) above aggregated $29,211,319, which is considerably more than the Bureau has cost the Government from the time of its creation until now.

These special examinations served to police the income accounts of the carriers, but made it necessary to neglect other accounts quite as important to examine in the public interest. At a time when intense competition for traffic was inducing the carrier to extend various concessions, direct and indirect, and in the nature of rebates, to large shippers—concessions which were wasteful and harmful in the long run to the railroad industry as well as to the general public—we were unable to give this matter the degree of attention which it would have had if our accountants had not been otherwise engaged. At a time, also, when many of the carriers were enjoying the prosperity which tempted them to unnecessary and wasteful expenditures of capital for various purposes, we were for the same reason unable to keep ourselves adequately informed in regard to these activities.

In connection with the latter matter, attention may be called to the work performed by the Bureau prior to 1918 in the investigations of the financial operations of the New Haven, the Rock Island, the Frisco, the Pere Marquette, the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, the Milwaukee, the Louisville & Nashville, and the Wabash-Pittsburgh terminal, which exposed serious abuses, dangerous to investors, shippers, and the country in general. After 1918 we did certain work of this character, as in the investigations of the causes of the Milwaukee and the Denver & Rio Grande receiverships, but it was greatly limited by the exigencies of the special work described above.

In 1933, when recapture was repealed, Congress jumped erroneously to the conclusion that our necessary accounting work would thereby be curtailed and reduced the appropriation for the Bureau of Accounts by more than 50 percent. It has not since been increased, except to the extent made necessary by changes in wage levels. The fact is, therefore, that since 1933 the Bureau has been inadequately staffed for the performance of its normal functions, as set forth in the beginning of this letter. In our opinion, a general examination of the accounts and records of every railroad company should be made at least once every 5 years. With the present staff, even if it were exclusively used for this purpose, it is doubtful whether such a general examination could be made once in 10 years.

If Senate Resolution 71 had not been passed, no doubt we would have gone on endeavoring to perform all of our accounting functions to the best of our ability with the staff available. The effect of the resolution has been to decrease the amount of work done under the function numbered (2) above, i. e., general accounting examinations, and to increase the amount done under function (3), i. e., special investigations, which are going particularly into the financial affairs of the carriers. In other words, we are, for the time being, concentrating on a more or less specialized matter, with lessening of the more routine work of policing the accounts.

Both of these duties are important and ought to be performed. However, this special inquiry into financial affairs I welcome, because it is a field which we have not sufficiently explored since 1918, for the reasons which I have already given, and which it was particularly desirable to explore because of the growth of holding-company operations affecting railroads in recent years. An investigation of these holding-company activities was made a few years ago by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and our accountants assisted in that investigation, which was ably conducted and of very great value, just as they are assisting in the present inquiry by your committee; but much has happened since the House investigation, and the present inquiry also goes into financial matters not affected by holding companies.

To a considerable extent we might have conducted such an inquiry on our own account, but I am glad that your committee has undertaken it for these reasons:

First. Our powers of inquiry are largely confined to the carriers, but these financial matters ramify into banking and holding-company activities which your committee has powers to investigate but we have not.

Second. The bringing to public attention of any abuses that may be discovered is in itself of great importance, and an investigation conducted by a Senate committee is more effective in this respect than an investigation conducted by the Commission.

Third. If the abuses can and should be corrected by legislation, it is of great advantage to have the investigation in charge of a committee of Congress which is in the best possible position to seek the necessary legislation. As a matter of fact, examination of the reports made to Congress by this Commission in the past will show that the present inquiry is again disclosing abuses and opportunities therefor, such as we have on several occasions brought to the attention of Congress, but ineffectively, probably because there were no Members of Congress who had special knowledge of and interest in these matters.

Fourth. Your committee has been able to employ for the investigation, in addition to our accountants, other men equipped by training for the work, thus magnifying largely the results which we would have been able to obtain unaided.

Fifth. I am very hopeful that one of the results of the investigation will be to demonstrate to your committee the amount of work involved in accounting and financial investigations, and the need for placing the Commission in a position to do such work adequately.

I may add that it is my hope, and also my expectation, that the inquiry which your committee is now conducting will have broadly constructive results, and particularly in leading to some effective Federal control over the creation and uses of holding and other corporations. There has long been sore need for such control, which will go to the root of many of the abuses in the conduct of private business from which the country has suffered.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH G. EASTMAN.

Mr. WHEELER. As a matter of fact, the Interstate Commerce Commission itself will get 99 percent of the benefit of this investigation, and the Senate will get the remaining 1 percent of benefit. What I hope to have the investigation do, however, is to result in the submission of some recommendations which will strengthen the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will make it impossible for railroad holding companies to do what they have been doing in the past in the way of milking some of the railroads of the country to the extent of millions of dollars and will result in amending the law so that the payment of rebates, as it has been done in the past, will have to cease, and many of the abuses which have occurred in the past will have to cease.

With reference to the question of money, let me say that we use men from the Public Works Administration. It has been said that that is using money appropriated for relief; but let me call attention to the fact that the first relief which was given in the United States was given to the railroads to the extent of $500,000,000. Secondly, relief to the extent of $200,000,000 was given under P. W. A. in the way of loans to the railroads. I do not desire to go into the subject at length. I do not wish to call any names, but I will say that already we have saved the Government of the United States by this investigation, through uncovering some frauds and preventing others, a great deal more than the investigation has cost or possibly can cost the Government of the United States.

In addition to that, let me say that the railroads of the country still owe the Government of the United States $33,000,000 that was loaned to them in 1922, that never has been paid back and never will be paid back. Something like 90,000 miles of railroad in the country are in process of reorganization. One railroad, the Milwaukee, was reorganized a few years ago, and shortly thereafter it again went through a reorganization, and when this investigation was begun, and the railroad was about to be reorganized once more, I protested against that course as chairman of the committee, and I was told by one of the commissioners that if that reorganization had gone through they would have had to have another reorganization of the railroad inside of at least a year's time.

In the case of most of the reorganizations of railroads that have gone through—not all of them, but most of them—the persons who have benefited have been the insiders, the lawyers and some of the bankers, and the roads generally have come out of the reorganizations more heavily in debt than when they went in. If the railroads of the country are to continue to be privately owned, let me say that the only way to insure that being done is to see that the reorganizations are honest, to see that the railroads are not milked by holding companies and selfish individuals who at present are milking some of them for their own selfish purposes, to see that rebates are not paid, and to see that the roads are not exploited by a few persons from a financial standpoint as they have been in recent years.

I will say frankly that I have no desire to do anything other than to try to put the railroads of the country upon a sound financial basis, to try to keep them there, and to see to it that one man or two men, by the investment of a few dollars, cannot control the lives and the destinies of the men who work on 23,000 miles of railroads, and the persons who have invested millions of dollars in the common stocks and bonds of the railroads. In doing that I shall likewise be protecting the Government of the United States in its investment in the railroads to the tune of $600,000,000.

The job is so stupendous that I am frank to say to the Senate that, if I had realized where it was to lead, I probably should not have undertaken it, because it is almost too great a task to be done as it should be done. I am not anxious to carry on the investigation. If any Senator wishes to stop it, I am perfectly willing that he should stop it. That would relieve me of a tremendous lot of hard work.

So far as the investigation is concerned, I desire to say that in my judgment there is not a Member of the Senate who has heard any complaint from any source as to the character of the examinations that have been made. I have utilized the services of men in Government employ, and particularly men from the Interstate Commerce Commission and men from the Securities and Exchange Commission—why? Because when they go into financial institutions, some of the institutions have reported to me that they are not afraid to have regular Government men come in, but they are afraid to have somebody who is only temporarily employed come into their places, because they are fearful that if that were done the temporary employees might take the information they obtain and use it in some other way than that in which it was supposed to be used. Every one of the men we have had in our employ has worked under the Interstate Commerce Commission examiners or under the Securities and Exchange examiners in some way, and all the reports and all the information coming to my committee have also been available to the Interstate Commerce Commission in every way, shape, and form.

The first investigation we made was undertaken at the instance and the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission because they wanted the information before they ruled upon a reorganization plan which was then pending before them.

I repeat that, while we have used these employees, I would not undertake for one moment to carry on the pending investigation unless I could have the assistance of the experts of these departments, and I am not going to carry it on any further unless I am supplied with adequate funds with which to conduct it.

I have tried to keep down the expenses of the committee in every possible manner, using in every way I could the means to that end, even in trivial matters. If the Senate objects to the investigation, if it desires to have it stopped, all it has to do is to indicate that it does not desire to have it proceed, and it will be relieving me of a tremendous amount of hard work. But if I do carry on the investigation, if it is the sense of the Senate that it desires to have it carried on, then I shall insist that we have adequate funds with which to conduct it in a thorough manner, so that I will not have to do a poor job, and so that when I get through I may be able to make some recommendations of a constructive character, both for the benefit of the railroads and for the benefit of the people generally.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate, but I wish to make a very brief statement, inasmuch as I offered the amendment to strike out the language contained in the bill which prohibits the use by committees of Government employees. I wish to say that the amendment which has been offered and which is now pending I think is a very satisfactory arrangement upon the subject.

I should not like to see the Senate, as a matter of fact I should not like to see either branch of Congress make it impossible for any committee of either House to investigate anything which should be investigated, and to be prohibited from using any governmental agency which might be serviceable in such an investigation.

I should not like to see such jealousy or envy or suspicion exist between the legislative branch and the executive branch of the Government that we could not call upon the executive branch for any assistance which might reveal conditions which ought to be corrected. For that reason, inasmuch as the amendment would make this provision permanent law, and does not apply simply to this appropriation, I hope the amendment when it shall be adopted will end the controversy with respect to the use of agents, examiners, or other employees of different departments, in assisting committees of the House or the Senate in revealing facts which ought to be revealed.

I wish to say just a word with reference to the investigation being conducted by the Senator from Montana as chairman of a committee of which I happen to be a member. I am also a member of the subcommittee conducting the investigation, although other duties have prevented me from attending the hearings regularly, as the Senator from Montana himself has attended them.

I do not think anyone can doubt the value of the investigations which from time to time are held and conducted by committees both of the House and the Senate. I recall that the Pujo Money Trust investigation, conducted in the House of Representatives some 25 or 30 years ago, contributed very largely to the revelation of conditions which resulted in the passage of the Federal Reserve Act, of which our colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], was an outstanding author.

The investigation of the Teapot Dome scandal resulted in the recovery by the United States of an infinitely greater amount than the investigation cost.

The Committee on Banking and Currency spent 2 years in investigating the stock market, and in that investigation we went partially into some of the matters which are now being investigated by the Wheeler committee. The Banking and Currency Committee had authorized and at its disposal $280,000, and turned back, I think, $15,000, making the net cost of that investigation $265,000, and it took 2 years to make the investigation. But that investigation revealed conditions which made it mandatory that Congress should pass legislation regulating the issue of securities and regulating their sale in the stock markets of the United States. No one who is now in his right mind would advocate the repeal of the legislation which came about as the result of that investigation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator's memory in these matters goes back a good many years. Does not the Senator recall that when the Pujo Money Trust investigation began really to get into the meat of the subject assigned to it for study, and when the Stanley investigation of the Steel Trust, which was made the basis for the present Federal Trade Commission Act, and when the Teapot Dome investigation, conducted by the late Senator Walsh of Montana, and the investigation of Harry Daugherty, conducted by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], and the investigation by the committee headed by Senator Reed, of Missouri, which did so much to expose corruption in the use of campaign expenditures in this country, and the investigation by the Banking and Currency Committee to which the Senator from Kentucky has referred—does not the Senator recall that when every one of them began to get into the heart of the matter assigned to it to investigate, began to bring about disclosures which must necessarily lead to remedial legislation, the same sort of agitation and clamor went up in various places, either that the committees were wasting too much money, or were receiving notoriety, or invading the privacy of people's business? In other words, in the instance of every important investigation which has been conducted in the last 35 years by congressional committees, which have done so much to bring about remedial legislation, the same clamor, either in one place or another, has gone up for the purpose of hamstringing the investigatorial powers of the Senate or the House.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is absolutely correct. Of course those who are being investigated in a manner which may be embarrassing to them as a result of the publicity growing out of it naturally do not like the idea of being investigated and, naturally, I suppose, as we all would under the same circumstances, frown upon the investigation and discourage it, and in any way that they possibly can undertake to hamper and cripple those who are charged with the responsibility of conducting the investigation.

We authorized the Federal Communications Commission to investigate the telephone situation in the United States, and appropriated, as I recall, a million dollars for that purpose. The entire telephone industry of this country is worth only about $5,000,000,000 dollars; and here we are investigating an industry which is worth $27,000,000,000, and the United States Government has $600,000,000 of the money of the people of this country invested in the railroads. The P. W. A. loaned them $200,000,000 and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has loaned them $400,000,000, so that the people of the United States are involved in the railroads to the extent of $600,000,000, and we are interested in undertaking to find out whether anything was "put over" on Uncle Sam in the lending of this money, or whether we can assist in facilitating its collection.

Up to date we have used only a hundred thousand dollars in the pending investigation. We got an appropriation of $25,000 to begin with, and at the last session of Congress we were given $75,000 more. I wish to state to the Senate that that is not sufficient to carry on the investigation. We will have to come back and ask for more money. But certainly the information that is being gathered by the committee is worth all that it will cost to the American people if, by legislation enacted in the future, we shall be able to protect them against the very evils which are being revealed and which have been a matter of common knowledge among the people of this country for a number of years.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. It is interesting to note some of the things which occurred as a result of Senate inquiries. I recall the Teapot Dome inquiry, where a great amount of loot was recovered from gentlemen who claimed they were expecting to make a hundred million dollars out of the property they acquired so easily. I also recall the probe of the Veterans' Bureau, which disclosed that about $3,000,000 worth of material was sold in Maryland for $600,000. The cost of those investigations, and others I could mention, concerning which I have much data in my files, represented but a tiny percentage of the amount of loot and plunder involved in the operations of the gentlemen whose activities were being investigated.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator. Undoubtedly he is correct.

Mr. President, I have no desire to make any further remarks, but at this point, in connection with what I have already said, I wish to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the February 3 issue of the New Republic, written by Mr. John T. Flynn, a famous commentator on stocks, bonds, and financial matters in the United States, giving an epitomized résumé of the work of the Wheeler committee up to date.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIGH VAN SWERINGEN FINANCE

Every Senator, every Representative, every depositor in a defaulted bank, every bank superintendent, including the Comptroller of the Currency, should make it his business to set aside 10 minutes to read what follows here. I have tried in as few words as possible to put clearly the amazing story brought out by Senator BURTON K. WHEELER about a certain financial episode in the weird history of the Van Sweringens. The Van Sweringens are dead, but there live certain claims against their allies which are as yet unliquidated.

It would be better, of course, if the reader could find the time to follow this story in the more than 200 pages of testimony and exhibits in which it lies buried. But he hasn't the time or the testimony. So I have tried to compress it into a few paragraphs. The legislator, the bank depositor who reads this may then decide for himself whether the trail of these strange adventures should be pursued farther.

In 1930 the Van Sweringens wanted some more millions for the complex and audacious series of holding companies and subsidiary corporations they were juggling. They had a corporation known as the Cleveland Terminals Building Co. Hereafter we shall speak of it as the C. T. B. Co. It owned directly or through its subsidiaries that extensive collection of real-estate properties which the Vans were exploiting in Cleveland—including the Terminal Towers, Cleveland Hotel, and all their properties centering around the old public square of Cleveland. It was just a big real-estate development which had been hit an almost fatal wallop by the great market collapse of 1929.

The Guaranty Co. of New York, after much negotiation, finally agreed to underwrite a note issue of $30,000,000 for the Vans. A new corporation was organized, called the Van Sweringen Corporation. To it was turned over the stock of the C. T. B. Co. and 500,000 shares of Alleghany Corporation stock. When all this was done we had the Van Sweringen Corporation—owned by the Vans—itself owning the C. T. B. Co. and 500,000 shares of Alleghany Corporation stock. And this Van Sweringen Corporation was now ready to borrow $30,000,000 by issuing notes which the Guaranty Co. would sell to the public.

A circular or prospectus was put out which described the C. T. B. Co. as owning a lot of real estate in urban Cleveland valued at $46,000,000. Here were the facts about that. The C. T. B. Co. at the end of 1929 had a balance sheet which showed that it was insolvent. It showed liabilities $803,000 in excess of assets. But 2½ months later, just a day or two before the prospectus for the $30,000,000 note issue was made up, the physical assets of the C. T. B. Co., consisting of real estate, were, by a twist of the wrist and the flourish of a fountain pen, written up $25,000,000. In addition, according to Senator WHEELER, a mortgage of $9,500,000 owed by the C. T. B. Co. and still unpaid was mysteriously written off. The $30,000,000 of notes were then offered to the public, without disclosing that the real property had just been written up by $25,000,000.

The Guaranty Co. officers testified before Senator WHEELER that they had never inspected the balance sheet showing the company insolvent. Furthermore, Senator WHEELER produced a letter from a Cleveland partner of the Guaranty Co., written at this time, saying that the Van Sweringens "are at the most believed in Cleveland to have overreached themselves in real estate and this proposition will be looked upon as an attempt on their part to liquidate their real-estate holdings, just as Alleghany liquidated their railroad holdings. But whereas Alleghany was floated in a popular railroad market, real estate in Cleveland, at least at the present time, is in a depression and the Van Sweringen realty in a considerable depression." Yet this was the moment, with the country in the depression, when the real-estate holdings of the C. T. B. Co. were doubled in value on the books.

The $30,000,000 of notes were then offered to the public. The offering was by the Guaranty Co. This was an affiliate wholly owned by the Guaranty Trust Co. The Guaranty Trust Co. was made trustee to act for the bondholders. In short, the Guaranty Co. acted for the Van Sweringens, on one side of the counter; the Guaranty Trust Co., which controlled the Guaranty Co., acted for the bondholders on the other side of the counter.

Now, the indenture securing the note issue had several clauses in it for the protection of the bondholders. One clause limited the amount of cash and marketable securities which the Van Sweringen Corporation could dispose of. At least one-half of all such cash and securities had to be kept intact for the benefit of the noteholders. But while the Van Sweringen Corporation, which issued the notes, had to do this, its subsidiary, the C. T. B. Co., did not. The principal security behind the notes was the real estate owned by the C. T. B. Co. Yet this company could sell or mortgage this real estate without hindrance. And that is what it did. Immediately it borrowed $10,500,000 and mortgaged a group of buildings for that amount, thus cutting down the security of the noteholders. It was then at liberty to use that $10,500,000 in any way it chose. It could gamble away the $10,500,000 and lose it. And that is what it did.

The Van Sweringen Corporation could also lend its cash to its subsidiary. And while the Van Sweringen Corporation, under the indenture, could not fritter away its cash, it could lend to the C. T. B. Co. and that company could fritter it away. And that is what it did. This is the kind of protection a bondholder gets when his interests are looked after by the same group of companies that represent the promoters.

Now what became of the $30,000,000 which the public paid the Van Sweringen Corporation for the notes? The Van Sweringen Corporation got this money and handed over the entire $30,000,000 to its subsidiary, the C. T. B. Co. And what did the C. T. B. Co. do with it? It proceeded to use it for speculation in the stock market. It also bought a lot of stocks from another Van Sweringen holding company—the Vaness Corporation.

The Vaness Corporation was at one time the top holding company of the Van Sweringen interests. It was what they called their "basket." It owned a lot of stocks of Van Sweringen companies which it had acquired before the stock-market collapse. Now the stocks were declining rapidly. So it proceeded to dump some of these stocks into the C. T. B. Co. The Vaness Corporation held shares in the Higbee Department Store. These were sold to the C. T. B. Co. for the same price paid by the Vaness Corporation for them before the collapse.

The General Securities Corporation was another Van Sweringen personal holding company or basket. It owned 600,000 shares of Alleghany Corporation stock. The shares were priced on the market at $18. The General Securities Corporation sold these shares to the C. T. B. Co. for $20—$2 above the market. The C. T. B. Co. turned over to the General Securities Corporation $1,200,000 more than the shares were worth in the market.

The Van Sweringens were carrying on astounding operations in the stock market. Most of this was done through the brokerage house of Paine, Webber & Co. It ran into hundreds of millions perhaps. Much, if not all, of this was done on margin. And at one time the Vans owed the Paine, Webber firm $32,872,000 on margin accounts. This situation was made possible by their innumerable accounts in the Paine, Webber firm. Apparently these Van Sweringens were in need of countless names under which to do business. They had a great number of corporations. They had accounts in the brokerage house in the names of all these and many of their subsidiaries. They had accounts in the names of other people. And they had accounts in the names of numbers—how many, Heaven only knows. One reads of account no. 700, account no. 955. There were not enough practical numbers. So they had account V–8, V–10. And in the names of these numerous companies they bought and sold hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of shares of margin—buying and selling the same stocks the same day by the thousands, stocks of their own companies and other companies. And now at this point Senator WHEELER has lifted the curtain on the way these men operated and the kind of aid they got from their banker allies in Wall Street.

Under this $30,000,000 note indenture, the Van Sweringens were obliged to keep with the Van Sweringen Corporation cash or securities to the value of one-half the original issue. Hence they placed with the Van Sweringen Corporation 500,000 shares of Alleghany stock, valued at $30 a share, or $15,000,000—half the $30,000,000 note issue. If the collateral thus deposited fell below the required value, they would have to replenish it in cash or securities.

Now as soon as the note issue of $30,000,000 was put out, the Van Sweringen interests resumed their difficulties. Alleghany Corporation continued to decline in price. For this reason, therefore, the Van Sweringens were interested in keeping the value of Alleghany stock up as near 30 as possible. So they resorted to the grand old scheme of pegging the price on the stock market. Indeed, one letter written by the Vans at this period indicates that the Guaranty people—the trustees of the bondholders—actually suggested doing this.

So the Vans began to buy and sell and thus to manipulate the price of Alleghany stock. They would buy, for instance, 3,600 shares on one day and the same day sell 3,200 shares. On another day they sold 10,000 shares and bought 14,000 shares of Alleghany, all through Paine, Webber & Co. And it was to carry on these operations that they were using a lot of the millions of the C. T. B. Co. obtained on the note issue. Keep this in mind. The $30,000,000 came from the public note buyers. To protect them the Vans had to deposit the $15,000,000 of Alleghany stock. Then, when that stock started to fall, the Vans used the money obtained from the noteholders to bolster the stock in the market and give it a fake value.

Behold this clever little incident. By August, Guaranty Trust vice presidents were talking about the possibility, even probability, of a Van Sweringen and C. T. B. bankruptcy. The Vaness Corporation was in bad shape in the office of Paine, Webber & Co. Its stock account was seriously undermargined. Paine, Webber took it up with the Vans. This was on October 1, 1930. On October 7, the Vaness Corporation sold 600,000 shares of Alleghany stock to the C. T. B. Co. for $12,000,000. The $12,000,000 was then transferred to the Vaness Corporation's account on Paine, Webber's books, thus rescuing it, while the C. T. B. Co. held the shares and found itself thrust into the position of a creditor of the brokerage house.

But these Alleghany stocks continued to go down. By the end of October the Vans were so heavily in debt to the Paine, Webber firm that action could no longer be postponed. Yet the Vans had no further funds with which to rescue themselves. They faced a crash. The brokerage firm was imperiled. The New York bankers, led by Morgan, were frightened. Such a crash at that moment would crack the whole financial world wide open. At this crisis the Morgan firm made a loan of $39,500,000 to the Van Sweringens. Of this $23,500,000 went to the C. T. B. Co. and $16,000,000 to the Vaness Corporation. These two companies paid $19,496,000 of this to the Paine, Webber firm and thus bailed them out.

When they turned the money over to the C. T. B. Co. the Vans withdrew from the Van Sweringen Corporation the Alleghany shares deposited there under the indenture. These shares numbered 900,000 by this time. The shares were turned over to the bankers as collateral. Other shares, constituting control of the Alleghany Corporation, were also turned over. It was those shares which were finally sold to Mr. Ball, the glass-jar manufacturer of Muncie, for 14 cents a share.

Now the Van Sweringen Corporation and the C. T. B. Co. are in bankruptcy and the noteholders have lost over $15,000,000.

But here is a vital point. In August 1930 a Guaranty Co. vice president was discussing a probable bankruptcy of the Van Sweringen Corporation. Yet 3 days later he and another vice president were discussing a campaign to sell these notes to bankers of the American Bankers' Association in Cleveland in September. Whether they pushed that campaign or not there is no evidence. But they did sell a lot of these notes to many banks. And Senator WHEELER put into the record a list of banks which bought such notes and are now closed.

Here, then, are some facts for various readers:

For bank depositors, stockholders in these closed banks: You have not been paid back your deposits. Have you considered whether or not you have any rights against the bankers who sold these notes and similar ones to you and the trustees who were named by those bankers to act for you? No one stockholder or depositor can enforce his claims. Perhaps no one closed bank can act. But what if all stockholders and depositors acted together to bring pressure on the proper banking authorities to enforce your claims against these bankers?

For bank superintendents and the Comptroller of the Currency: You are administering these closed banks. They hold countless millions of notes and bonds and stocks similar to these Van Sweringen notes. As trustees for the State and the depositors, what steps have you taken to enforce against the bankers and trustees the claims of depositors because of these performances in connection with security issues on which these banks have lost millions?

For Representatives and Senators: This single disclosure of Senator Wheeler, the most ably pursued investigation of a financial deal and only one of many presented by his committee, ought to be worth many millions to abused bank depositors. Will you let this investigation lapse? Will you let the bankers kill it? And will you fail to take the necessary measures to prevent such activities in the future? What can you do? You cannot know until this committee has completed its great labors and studied a path for you to follow.

JOHN T. FLYNN.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the same connection, and at this point, to follow the article just referred to, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD editorial comments from 43 daily newspapers scattered all over the United States, commenting on the value and the propriety and the timeliness of the particular investigation which is headed by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I shall not read them, but I ask to have them printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

The importance of this committee's work may be seen in part from the widespread editorial reaction of the newspapers of the country:

The Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal, "There is a point past which investigations have no right to go * * * but the Senate investigation is a clear case where public interest is deeply involved."

The Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune expresses the hope that "The Senate will go on until it unravels the complete story of their (the Van Sweringens') operations in order that it may serve as a warning against permitting the return of circumstances that would sprout another crop of such high-pressure artists."

The Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette, "Senator Wheeler also drew an admission from a banker closely affiliated with the Morgan interests that when the bankers were loaned and invested up to their necks in Van Sweringen enterprises * * * that banker-held stock was voted under 'stage names' to keep the public from getting wise that the banks were in the saddle."

The New York Post, "We wonder whether Congress is going to stop or starve the Wheeler investigation and leave the roof unpatched until the next time it rains.

"Or whether it is going to widen the investigation's authority and give it ample funds to protect the public's twenty-five-billion-dollar investment in the railroad * * *.

"It is cheap insurance against future railroad bankruptcies."

The Washington (D. C.) News: "Lobbies are massing on Capitol Hill in the attempt to kill off two unfinished but very important United States Senate investigations. * * * the La Follette committee, although hampered by opposition and the woefully meager appropriation, has done a magnificent service so far in turning the light on the type of medievalism in certain industries that has astounded the country. * * * Important also is continuance of the Wheeler committee's work. In view of the fact that rails form the keystone for investments by insurance companies and small investors, it is Congress' business to get to the bottom of this situation."

The Lincoln (Nebr.) Journal: "It is worth while to make a study of the practices and devices of financiers who amass wealth through the use of other people's money. The methods used in combining great railway properties into vast systems will also bear investigations. * * * Thousands have lost by investing in properties that now make up the group of Van Sweringen roads."

The Pontiac (Mich.) Press: "The whole organization of American finance is on an iniquitous and unscrupulous basis when such exploitations as these (as the Van Sweringen's) can go on right under the eyes of public authorities and nothing can be done about it."

The Beaumont (Tex.) Enterprise: "The Van Sweringen brothers have been compared unfavorably with the pioneer railroad builders of the United States. * * * The Van Sweringen brothers were not pioneers, but railroad manipulators."

The St. Paul (Minn.) News: "The Senate investigating committee reviewed the collapse of Van Sweringen rail and industrial empire. * * * It is relevant evidence so far as the public is concerned of frenzied finance which acquires useful enterprises, juggles them about, and tosses them into the lap of a bewildered glassmaker. It is quite apparent that the Government must step in to stop such irresponsible and costly private initiative."

The Omaha (Nebr.) World Herald: "* * * There won't be much romance about this investigation. It will be a cynical effort to find out how one becomes a railroad mogul on a shoe string, how he manages to hang on to his moguiship while the people who put up the money, that is the investing public, lose upwards of $40,000,000 in the deal."

The Denver (Colo.) Post: "The investigation 'calls attention to the way the holding-company system has been used to enable speculators to control and operate far-flung transportation and industrial enterprises which are owned by other people.'"

The Paducah (Ky.) Sun-Democrat: "The sale (of Alleghany to Mid-America Corporation) gives a new insight into the evils of holding-company practices, which often ignore the interests of stockholders as they do the weather in Siam."

The Quincy (Ill.) Herald-Whig: "What the committee will probably do as a result of its investigation is to act against railroad holding companies in the same way that moves have been made to dispose of them in the utility field. There was one matter that was not explained, and that was how the Morgan interests let go of the Van Sweringen holdings at a knock-down price * * *."

The East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal: "Investors who spend time pouring over the quotation tables on the financial and market pages might read with profit the Senate committee's revelations of how holding companies operate and to whose profit."

The Durham (N. C.) Herald: "* * * People are coming to conclude that there is something wrong with the scheme that not only permits but encourages the nefariousness that quite obviously figures in the Van Sweringen-Ball farce."

The Philadelphia Inquirer: If the Wheeler committee's inquiry "opens the way to sound regulatory legislation through which such operations as those of the Van Sweringens can be effectively prevented, it will have performed a vitally useful service to the country."

The Jamestown (N. Y.) Post: "The astonishing feature of the (committee's) showing lies in the fact that the man who is thus represented be so important a financial factor in the Van Sweringen undertaking admits that he has not attempted to familiarize himself with the business."

The Charlotte (N. C.) News: The investigation "seems to promise light on a long, obfuscated subject * * * a belief often voiced by competent authorities is that the railroads are suffering not so much from lack of traffic and operating sufficiency as from an accumulated top-heavy capital labyrinth."

The Washington Post: "It is clear that the excesses of the holding-company type of financial regulation, of which the Van Sweringens were the outstanding practitioners in the railroad field, ought to be exposed. For this reason alone the Wheeler committee has an opportunity to perform a real service in bringing to light the unsavory practices which made it possible for a handful of men to play ducks and drakes with important sections of a great industry. * * * The real need is for a thorough and scientific investigation of current railroad financing methods and the problems to which these methods have given rise."

The Phoenix (Ariz.) Republic: "The Wheeler investigating committee has something to chew upon which in the absence of new teeth in the laws it will find pretty hard to masticate. * * *"

The Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal: "A Senate committee, investigating the Van Sweringen properties, penetrated a short distance into that unexplored wilderness of high finance where individual initiative pyramids a multifarious collection of incorporated industries to a holding-company peak."

The Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune: "Valuable information is being given the Nation in the present investigation of railroad financing by the Senate committee headed by Senator WHEELER, of Montana. Public hearings now under way serve to make clear the danger of speculative finance operating through holding companies in the field of railroad transportation."

The Spokane (Wash.) Review: "These astounding revelations should interest Senators and Representatives who are under high pressure from railroad lobbyists."

The Buffalo (N. Y.) Courier-Express: "* * * It was a 'little strange' that that the House of Morgan was willing to let the securities controlling these vast properties go at less than the market quotations. * * * All this, no doubt, will increase the public's perplexity over who owns what in these days of involved finance."

The Youngstown (Ohio) Vindicator: "Senator WHEELER's committee * * * is wondering why Morgan sold for $3,121,000 stocks which at the time had a higher market value than that. The committee thinks there must have been some kind of shenanigans. Perhaps the committee is right."

The St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch: "To dignify such manipulations (as those exposed by the committee) as financial operations is not merely fatuous; it is plain falsehood. This is high-powered trickery—holding-company chicanery at its virulent worst."

The Wilkes-Barre (Pa.) Record: "It is probably just as well that the public should know more about the financial operations which make possible the assembling of such a vast conglomeration of properties through a comparatively small investment in them on the part of the controlling interests."

The Norfolk (Va.) Virginian-Pilot: "If this (the committee's revelations) is healthy industrial development, then all the textbooks had better be rewritten. As a matter of fact, it is not healthy industrial development, and the country now knows it."

The Philadelphia (Pa.) Ledger: "The committee's disclosures are 'an outstanding example of the manner of which holding companies may be misused.'"

The Saginaw (Mich.) News: "The type of holding-company structure revealed by the committee 'permits with a vengeance the use of other people's money to make profits for a skilled manipulator.'"

The Schenectady (N. Y.) Union Star: "The facts brought forth up to the present time promise to lead to an exciting and unusual display of banking and stock manipulation * * *."

The Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal: The committee's investigation "revealed that swashbuckling bands of pirates are still manipulating railroads in a way that would have put Jay Gould to shame in his palmiest days."

The Watertown (N. Y.) Times: "This type of maneuvering when millions are made and lost on paper has not always been healthy for the small stockholders, but seemingly is most satisfactory to the major operators."

The Green Bay (Wis.) Press Gazette: "It is the obligation of legislators to limit holding companies in such a way that they may be only used consistently with the public welfare. And these uses do not include any of the dead Van Sweringen's plans."

The Los Angeles (Calif.) Evening News: "Once more appears the grasping hand of the House of Morgan in transactions that Senator WHEELER declares 'might have been expected from a wildcat mining company.'"

The Camden (N. J.) Courier: "The I. C. C. must wait for a Senate inquiry to find out what these nonrailroad companies have been doing to hamstring railroad regulation. * * * They (the railroads) might never have needed to borrow public money if they hadn't been so successful at evading public regulation."

The Kansas City (Mo.) Times: "It (the Terminal Shares transaction exposed by the committee) was a complicated deal which, when it finally became known, furnished additional evidence of the need for better regulation of holding companies."

The Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal: "The Commerce Commission has control of railroads, but holding companies are a labyrinth. * * * The job of Congress ought to be clear; it is to get hold of the holding company."

The Chattanooga (Tenn.) News: "The story revealed by the committee 'involved as amazing a piece of financial legerdemain as even the high-flying days of 1928 could have boasted.'"

The Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer: "Some of the testimony presented to the Wheeler committee * * * tends to support the view that some shenanigans went on behind the scenes."

The St. Louis (Mo.) Star Times: "The Senate committee investigating railroad finances has brought out methods of bookkeeping and issuing financial statements that top anything disclosed in the frenzy finance era of the late twenties."

The Philadelphia (Pa.) Inquirer: "Recent disclosures by the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee * * * indicated that more regulatory legislation may be necessary in fields of finance."

The Madison (Wis.) Times: "Not since the Insull debacle occupied the headlines has there been so startling and revealing an exposé of holding-company manipulation and devious financial deals as that which has been brought to light by the Senate committee investigating railroad finance."

The St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch: "The inquiry has ripped away the high pretensions of banker control of the railroads and has shown it for what it is. * * * Here was a banking house that had profited handsomely in the business of financing the Missouri Pacific, but is now ready on its own testimony to 'let the road go bust.'"

The St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch: "The disclosures of this investigation, both past and future, are important, not only as disclosures which enlighten the public but a great stake in the wise management of railroads. They are important also as the findings in which regulatory legislation will be based. * * * This investigation, too long delayed, should be permitted to proceed without hindrance."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have only recently come into the Senate Chamber, and have not heard the early part of this discussion. Perhaps that fact should induce me to keep quiet at the moment. However, as a minority member of the committee conducting the railroad hearings, I desire to say a word.

In my opinion, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has shown an amazing industry, high intelligence, and a fairness which can be challenged by no interest in the conduct of the investigation up to this time. The story which has been developed by the committee is one of great interest and suggests some matters which deserve the serious consideration of the Congress of the United States.

In the last Congress we undertook to deal with the question of holding companies in the utility field. I was not satisfied with the way in which the matter was dealt with at that time. I think perhaps the most important question touched on by the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce up to this time is the question of holding companies in the transportation field. That is a problem which I think we as a Congress cannot avoid giving study to and possibly legislating upon. Certainly we ought to come to some conclusion as to whether the subject requires action by us.

Ordinarily I am not enthusiastic about investigations by a political body. Ordinarily I should be very much in favor of the provision in this bill forbidding, as I understand, the use of persons from Government departments by standing committees or special committees for committee work; but as I understand the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, there have been employed and there are now employed some 10 or 12 people coming from such a source. In that situation, and while the investigation in question is proceeding, I am not willing to deprive the committee, and I am not willing to deprive the chairman of the committee, of the aid which those persons can give to him in the conduct of this undertaking.

If this question came up at some other time, I should cheerfully and eagerly vote to exclude the use of outside persons by congressional committees; but, in the situation which confronts us, in view of the tremendous importance of this investigation, and in view of the manner in which the investigation is being conducted by the chairman of the committee, I am opposed to taking from the committee and from him this aid, and I hope it will not be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH].

Mr. BLACK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague [Mr. GLASS] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea." My colleague has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained on account of illness; also that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are necessarily detained. If present and voting, they would vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GERRY. My colleague [Mr. GREEN] is detained from the Senate by reason of attending the induction into office of the new president of Brown University. I am informed that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 0, as follows:

So Mr. SCHWELLENBACH'S amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, previously I had submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which certain language on page 2 of the bill was adopted. At that time I offered an amendment relating to lines 16, 17, and 18, page 2, of the bill, which I now withdraw and substitute the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the vote by which the entire committee amendment on page 2 was agreed to would first have to be reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am informed another amendment is to be proposed in addition to the amendment of the Senator from Washington, and that the discussion of that amendment will require more time than the Senate probably would want to devote to it this afternoon. I inquire of the Senator from Washington whether it would suit his convenience to have his amendment go over until tomorrow?

Mr. BONE. I can make an explanation of it in 30 seconds.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. BONE. My purpose in moving to strike out the language is due to the fact that the language is surplusage in view of the amendment which was adopted as submitted by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH]. My amendment would strike out this language on page 2 of the bill:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for services, personal, professional, or otherwise, in excess of the rate of $3,600 per annum.

That language is not only surplusage, but it would be very confusing if left in the bill in the light of the adoption of the amendment of the junior Senator from Washington. I have talked with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], about it, and I understand neither objects to the language being stricken from the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. As one member of the committee, and as Chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I desire to say I have no objection to the amendment. The proviso was first inserted in the law about 6 or 8 years ago. In my judgment it has now become an unwise provision. I think it should be left to the Committee to Audit and Control to pass upon the merits of the particular investigation involved and to determine what discretion the investigating committee should have in the employment of attorneys and experts. I believe it is unwise to continue in the law this provision which results in an investigating committee's being unable to employ competent persons to discharge the duties of investigator or otherwise. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Washington will be adopted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, has the vote by which the committee amendment on page 2 was agreed to been reconsidered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. That vote must first be reconsidered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment on page 2, lines 11 to 22 inclusive, was agreed to, may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, lines 16, 17, and 18, to strike out the proviso, as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for services, personal, professional, or otherwise, in excess of the rate of $3,600 per annum.

And in line 19, after the word "Provided", to strike out the word "further."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as I understand another amendment is to be offered to that particular committee amendment by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], I hope the committee amendment as amended will not be now acted upon. It might as well go over. I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily passed over.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I submit an inquiry to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have just been informed that the Senator from Washington does not now propose to offer the amendment which he advised me he had intended to offer, and accordingly I withdraw my request, and ask that the committee amendment as amended be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I have pending an amendment which has to do with the building program of the Navy, and is in effect an amendment of the Vinson Act. I offer it for the reason that I have in my hand a communication from the Secretary of the Navy addressed to all naval stations and navy yards of the country, indicating that a drastic curtailment of forces is now in order; in other words, a large number of men are going to be laid off in the Government navy yards. The purpose of my amendment is to require the Navy to build in Government navy yards the two battleships now in contemplation. I may say that I have very grave doubt if the amendment would be in order if a point of order should be made against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert on page 23, after line 16, the following new section:

SEC. —. That hereafter all naval vessels and the main engines, ordnance, and armament for such vessels, including those appropriated for in the Naval Appropriation Act of June 3, 1936, contracts for which vessels or materials have not yet been let, upon which work is undertaken, shall be constructed or manufactured, as the case may be, in the Government navy yards, naval stations, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States: Provided, That the term "contracted or manufactured" when applied to main engines, ordnance, and armament shall include the making of castings, forgings, machining the parts, both roughing and finishing operations, assembling the parts, and installing them: Provided further, That raw materials from which castings and forgings are made, fabricated materials, such as sheet metal, rods, bars, and tubing, out of which parts are made, and minor appurtenances, such as chronometers and grease cups, may be purchased in the open market.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I think it necessary to make the point of order that it is legislation upon a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The bill is before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the sum of money hereby appropriated or authorized to be appropriated shall be allocated, paid or expended for any State, city, or county project or a project of any other governmental subdivision or agency unless and until such State, city, county, governmental subdivision or agency shall have filed with the President of the United States a certificate of necessity, showing that such State, city, county, governmental subdivision or agency has exhausted its resources to provide for the employment of its unemployed; such showing to set out the tax rate, the income, the indebtedness, the budget, of such State, county, city, governmental subdivision or agency, and the number of unemployed therein; and thereupon a finding by such authority as the President shall designate that such State, county, city, governmental subdivision or agency is in actual need of the aid of the Federal Government to provide for its unemployed.

Mr. BAILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether it is his desire to try to conclude the consideration of the bill this evening, or whether he prefers that it go over until tomorrow?

Mr. ADAMS. I should prefer to have it go over, because I think the pending amendment ought to be discussed somewhat carefully.

Mr. ROBINSON. I myself am of the opinion that considerable time will be consumed in debate on the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. That is my impression.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. WAGNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported favorably the nomination of Fred W. Catlett, of Washington, to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for a term of 6 years from July 22, 1936, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate. (Reappointment.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Sidney C. Mize to be United States judge for the southern district of Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harvey G. Fields to be United States attorney for the western district of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of H. Chess Richardson to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Louis E. LeBlanc to be United States marshal for the western district of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Granville T. Norris to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 3, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Eternal One, whose presence occupies all space, unchanged through the flight of time, Thou only art God! Without Thee, virtue, duty, and principle would be mocked and spurned. We praise Thee for Thy merciful goodness which has followed us all our days. Heavenly Father, we must not forget to keep Thee at the very heart and soul of our beings. From Thee alone flow strength and grace for each day. Help us to make our little world better and life a worthier thing. Be merciful unto us and let us make Thy wings our refuge; for Thy mercy is great unto the heavens and Thy truth unto the clouds. Be Thou exalted and let Thy glory be above the earth. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS

The SPEAKER. Under the special order heretofore made the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, as long as we have a nation we will have economic, social, and industrial problems to solve.

As we drift from an agricultural nation into an industrial nation, our problems become more complex, and each generation finds that new procedures must be set up in order to take care of the needs and the activities of the people in their generation.

Among the problems that will always confront the people of the United States are the problems of (a) transportation, (b) unemployment, (c) national defense.

It is believed by many of our best engineers and stanchest nation-builders that we can, in a large measure, solve the three problems mentioned above, or at least do our constructive part in initiating the solving of these problems, by building a national system of highways.

The first act of Congress relative to the building of national roads was the bill passed by Congress during Jefferson's administration and signed by him March 29, 1806. This bill carried with it an appropriation of $30,000 for the preliminary survey of the old National Pike, running from Baltimore, Md., via Cumberland, Md., Uniontown, Pa., Washington, Pa., Wheeling, W. Va., to the Ohio River. I might say at this point also that for 40 years thereafter Congress appropriated each year money for the improvement and upkeep of the National Pike, a sum total appropriated of $6,324,919.33.

It was President Monroe who vetoed the appropriation the forty-first year. The history of this phase of road building is very interesting, and if there is no objection on the part of the House, I will insert at this point a copy of the first public document authorizing the beginning of work on the old National Pike, together with some short comments by different prominent men of that day. I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the public document I refer to in Thomas Jefferson's own handwriting.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a copy of the original document by Thomas Jefferson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

WORDING OF THE FIRST PUBLIC DOCUMENT AUTHORIZING THE BEGINNING OF WORK ON THE NATIONAL ROAD

THOMAS JEFFERSON,
President of the United States of America.
To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that in pursuance of the act of Congress passed on the 29th of March 1806, entitled "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio", and reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, diligence, and discretion of Eli Williams, of Maryland, I have nominated and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him a commissioner in connection with Thomas Moore, of Maryland, and Joseph Kerr, of Ohio, for the purposes expressed in the said act; and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining, during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof I have caused the letters to be made patent and the seal of the United States to be herewith affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 16th day of January, A. D. 1807, and of the independence of the United States of America the thirty-first. (Recorded.)

TH. JEFFERSON.

By the President:

JAMES MADISON,
Secretary of State.

This commission, dated 16th July 1806, was issued in the recess of the Senate, who have since ratified the appointment, and this commission issued in consequence of that ratification.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, from about 1850 to 1903 Congress did not take any constructive part in the building of national highways. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that on February 7, 1903, Congressman Brownlow, of Tennessee, delivered a short address from the floor of this House on national highways.

Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill calling for the building of three transcontinental highways running from our eastern shore to our western shore and six running from the southern border to the northern border.

I anticipate that many of my colleagues as well as many of my friends will think my presentation too ambitious, but, my friends, if we will stop to consider what we have accomplished in the last 25 years in the building of streets and highways, I feel sure you will agree with me that in a quarter of a century from now we will have a system of highways superior to the one I am recommending today.

We sometimes say that electricity is just in its infancy; that the uses of radio are in their infancy. Most of us believe this is true. I might say that our road-building program in the Nation is just in its infancy.

Every year we realize more fully that the Federal Government and the States must cooperate both in planning and financing a system of highways that will be adequate to take care of the transportation of our commodities.

As I said, the States have done much and the Nation has done much in the last 25 years, but much of it has been piecemeal.

Different counties and different States went ahead and built roads during the last quarter of a century without taking into consideration whether they would dovetail into what their neighboring county was building or what their neighboring State was building.

As the map will show you that I am about to unfold, I suggest that we build these highways to last for hundreds of years, like the Appian Way in Italy, or the thousand-mile boulevard built by England in farther India 300 years ago.

By the way, these two roads are just as solid today as they were when they were built, and there is no reason why our Government should not build highways at this time that will last for not only hundreds of years but for thousands of years.

I could say that we need these roads for the transportation of our commodities and for our social needs, and that would be sufficient justification for them to be built, but there are other major reasons why they should be built and why we should start to build them now. In building these roads we would provide for a program to cover a space of 25 years for the building of such highways.

I do not say that the Government should build these highways. I would prefer to see them let out on bids in units so that private industry might build the roads.

Among the provisions I would make, if they were let out to private industries to build, would be that inasmuch as we will have for many years to come, two or three millions of able-bodied men between the ages of 50 and 65 years who will not benefit by the social-security law to the extent that they will be sufficiently pensioned when they reach 65.

It should be stipulated that all such men should be taken care of first in the building of such highways—that at certain appropriate locations along these highways would be constructed community settlements, something like the C. C. C. camps, only of a more permanent character. So we could take these unemployed men from the industrial centers and other centers to such locations, and give them a decent place in which to live and a decent wage.

This would be not only a Nation-building program, but it would be a citizen-building program.

Mr. Speaker, as long as we have hundreds of thousands of able-bodied men loafing around our street corners and in our bowling alleys and poolrooms and barrooms and gambling joints, just so long will we be slowly but surely building a citizenship that will eventually be too flabby and weak to perpetuate our form of government.

These men, if put to work on such a constructive project as building these highways, would take on new life because they would know they were building something permanent and worth-while that would be handed down to their children, and to their children's children. They would feel sure that they were contributing something that would make their Nation a better place in which to live.

Mr. Speaker, the two major things that I have briefly mentioned—transportation of our commodities and the absorbing of a big percent of our unemployed for the next quarter of a century are commendable. But perhaps the most outstanding and the one feature embodying the greatest saving in dollars over a period of, we will say, 25 years, is the use of these highways in our scheme of national defense.

We all agree that the type of national-defense equipment that we need today and will need in the future is not the same identical type of national-defense equipment that we needed 10 or 25 or 30 years ago. I assume that everybody favors some type of national defense for his Nation. I further assume that everybody believes with me that our first line of national defense is made up of our homes, our schools, and our churches.

However, as long as other nations fly at the throats of each other, as we have witnessed for the past space of years, just so long must we provide adequate defense to protect our shores and our possessions in case a foreign foe should choose to disturb our people.

Just as our rubber-wheel units in our national-defense equipment have practically replaced our horse and mule units, so large mobile units on rubber wheels and other large and small units on wings should, and will, take up the major load of defense in the years immediately ahead of us.

I mean by this, Mr. Speaker, that if we had these roads, as set forth in this bill, completed, we could and would save millions of dollars on national-defense expenditures each year, and at the same time have greater strength, efficiency, and flexibility in our national-defense equipment than we have today.

I would not do away with our splendid forts and fortifications that we now have. No; we should keep them equipped with adequate manpower and material equipment, and at the same time provide for better housing and for better facilities for our Army boys in these forts.

But instead of enlarging these stationary fortifications, instead of spending on them multiplied millions each year, we could, and would, if these roads were completed, put the major part of our national-defense equipment that we provide for each year on rubber wheels and wings in a zone some place in the center of the United States. Then, in the case of emergency on our shores or borders, we could rush our wing equipment in 12 hours to the western shore, the eastern shore, or to either of our boundaries, and our rubber-wheel equipment could be moved in 72 hours to the western coast or to the eastern coast, and in 36 hours to the northern border or to the southern border.

In other words, gentlemen of the House, this program would give us adequate means of transportation for many years to come. At the end of half a century, I assume, if they were completed now, they would point back to our time and wonder why in the world we did not build bigger and wider highways in 1937.

This program would also absorb most of our able-bodied unemployed, and especially as I stated, those over 50 years of age who have nothing to look forward to except dole, poverty, or the poorhouse. And it would give us a national-defense set-up that would be at least 50 percent more economical than our present scheme of national defense, and two or three times more efficient and effective if an emergency arises.

And I may say that my reason for making this statement is that I just took a survey of the quantity of stationary national-defense equipment that is left in a certain nation across the sea today, after 3 months of disturbance and destruction.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman is making a very interesting speech as to the advisability of providing quick transportation. Does the gentleman know that in the Isthmus of Panama, with two big Canal stations to protect, one at either end of the Canal, that there is no highway across the Isthmus but that all transportation must be by railroad or by water?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I do know that, and I am in favor of remedying it.

Mr. Speaker, this program will give us adequate means of transportation for many years to come. At the end of the next half century our children's children will ask, however, why those fellows back in 1937 did not build better highways.

Mr. Speaker, my bill calls for three east-and-west highways; one starting at Boston, Mass., and running via Chicago, through to Salem, Oreg.; another starting at Baltimore, following the old national trail to East St. Louis, Salt Lake City, and San Francisco; and another starting at some place in South Carolina or Florida, running along the border through San Antonio, Tex., El Paso, to Los Angeles.

My first north-and-south highway starts in Maine and runs south about 75 miles from the seacoast. The second starts at Buffalo and runs through Pittsburgh; Charleston, W. Va.; Atlanta, Ga.; to Pensacola, Fla. A third starts at New Orleans and goes up to Chicago through Memphis, Tenn. A fourth starts at San Antonio and goes to Fargo, N. Dak. A fifth starts at El Paso and follows the eastern side of the Sierra Mountains, through Montana. The sixth and last will be located on the western coast, starting at San Diego, running north inland about 50 or 75 miles from the coast to Seattle.

Mr. Speaker, the reason I say these highways will be of such vast importance for national defense is that they would be built 60 to 80 feet wide and run as straight as possible, and all cross traffic to go overhead or underneath. The rights-of-way to be 200 feet wide or more and said rights-of-way to be leveled the entire width to the road level without any obstruction except shrubbery or flowers. The electric-light poles to be on the outer edges of the 200-foot rights-of-way.

At the intersection of each of these highways we would have an airport of at least 8,000 feet square to take care of that type of transportation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I gladly yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I hesitate to make an observation, because I am intensely interested in the discourse the gentleman is giving. I believe perhaps the gentleman may be in error in saying he is in favor of a road 60 to 80 feet wide. Does not the gentleman mean a much wider road?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that matter. I was going to add these highways would be 60 to 80 feet of concrete lanes with a right-of-way 200 feet wide clear across the Nation, to be built up at a later date if the need demanded.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I make a further observation?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Within the last 3 months Henry Ford, the automobile manufacturer, stated in a press conference he believed it would not be long until we would have a system of national highways with six lanes. Does that agree with the gentleman's study?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. It does.

Mr. RANDOLPH. One further observation; and I am sorry to interrupt. I believe the gentleman is familiar with a resolution which I introduced during the Seventy-fourth Congress calling for a study to be made by a special commission of the feasibility of a system of national highways. I do not mean to inject myself but simply bring it into the discussion.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, if we had this zone in the middle of the United States with these highways we could spend one-fourth of the amount we spend now for national-defense equipment, which amounts to about $1,100,000,000 a year. We would have these wheels and wings in the center of the United States, and in case of an emergency we would move either to the east or west in 12 hours, and in 72 hours we could be there with our rubber-wheel material.

Furthermore, we would light these highways up from coast to coast, and during the night we would not have these air accidents, because the pilot would be looking down on a highway at least 80 feet wide, already prepared, and nothing to interfere with his wings in an emergency landing.

May I say here that Germany started in 1924 to build such a system of highways.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, may I make one more statement in reference to several other countries and what they have done. I call particular attention to Germany because I have maps and data in my office concerning Germany's road construction since 1924, and it corresponds in type and system to what I am saying here, with the exception theirs runs in circles. Around Berlin they have built a circular road four lanes wide and 15 miles from the edge of the present city limits. If you were to start at Brussels and go toward Berlin today, when you hit this four-lane circular highway you could not go straight in to Berlin. You would have to turn and go either under or over to the right and then to the left to enter the city.

They have built this road so that in an emergency an airplane may land on the road any place because the shrubbery is only high enough to dim the glare of lights. In an emergency, as I stated, they can land an airplane any place on the road without interference.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I trust, as one member of the Committee on Roads, that the gentleman's bill and other pending resolutions on this subject may have adequate hearings.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. I appreciate the gentleman's friendly interest.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Matheus M. Gilmette, duly appointed administrator of the estate of Marcellino M. Gilmette, the sum of $110, representing wages due to said Marcellino M. Gilmette, who died at sea on April 1, 1924.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the figures "$110", insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

On page 1, line 10, insert after the figures "1924": "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GEORGE HOUSTON

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1838, for the relief of George Houston.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limitations of time in sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 5, secs. 767 and 770), are hereby waived in favor of George Houston, who is alleged to have sustained an injury on February 4, 1931, while employed as a rural mail carrier from the post office at Wood Lake, Minn., which resulted in permanent physical disability, and his case is authorized to be considered and acted upon under the remaining provisions of such act, as amended, if he files a claim for compensation with the United States Employees' Compensation Commission not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this act: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

W. D. DAVIS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1851, for the relief of W. D. Davis.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That W. D. Davis, of Fort Worth, Tex., as successor to the firm of W. D. & M. L. Davis, statutes of limitations being waived, is authorized to enter suit in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas for the amount alleged to be due from the United States on account of loss sustained by the firm arising out of action of inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture during 1917 and 1918 in driving cattle infested with Texas fever ticks, or having such cattle driven under their direction or supervision, over the land of the firm, or using the firm's dipping vats for dipping such tick-infested cattle. For the purposes of such suit said W. D. Davis shall have all rights of the firm.

SEC. 2. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas to hear and determine such claim without the intervention of a jury. The action in said court may be presented by a petition making the United States party defendant and shall set forth all the facts upon which the claimant bases his claim, and the petition may be verified by the agent or attorney of said claimant; official letters, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used as evidence; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found due from the United States to said claimant by reason of the alleged action, upon the same principles and under the same measure of liability as in like cases between private parties, and the Government hereby waives its immunity from suit. And said claimant and the United States of America shall have all rights of appeal or writ of error or other remedy as in similar cases between private persons or corporations: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of said court, and upon such notice it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That such suit shall be begun within 6 months of the date of the approval of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I think that is as far as some of the members of the Committee are prepared to go today.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4064, the independent offices appropriation bill. Pending the consideration of that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue throughout the afternoon, to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate continue throughout the day, to be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4064, the independent offices appropriation bill, with Mr. BOLAND of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RAMSAY].

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Chairman, during the last few days two gentlemen—one from Massachusetts and the other from Georgia—have attempted to defend not only the recent action but all former actions of the Supreme Court of the United States in setting aside acts of Congress.

The arguments of the gentleman from Georgia are most remarkable in this, that he admits that Chief Justice Marshall exercised this power in the Marbury case without any grant found in the Constitution, and that the decision would not have been made if it had not been for a political exigency.

He admits, to sustain this power, there is no grant in the Constitution authorizing such action by the Supreme Court, but he believes "it was a necessarily implied power."

This is, indeed, strange argument, when you consider that Chief Justice Marshall himself, in arguing this very question before the Supreme Court as a lawyer in the case of Ware against Hylton, found in Dallas Third, page 212, declared that—

> The legislative authority of any country can only be restrained by its own municipal constitution. This is a principle that springs from the very nature of society; and the judicial authority can have no right to question the validity of a law unless such a jurisdiction is expressly given by the Constitution.

And note—the gentleman from Georgia, who believes that the great Chief Justice was infallible, expresses the opinion now that the Court should take such power because of implication, while this great judge himself declared that the Supreme Court could not exercise such power unless expressly granted.

I gather from the remarks of the gentlemen who believe that the Supreme Court may exercise power to set aside acts of Congress by implication that Congress cannot exercise power to pass legislation unless by express authorization.

Of course, this view can well be entertained by men who believe that "Mr. Jefferson was an ambitious man, craving popularity and power, and knew how to reward his friends and punish his enemies."

Thomas Jefferson needs no defense now. His place in the history of his country as a statesman, patriot, and citizen is far above the attacks of present-day followers of the Essex Junto, and his name is as secure as any in the history of the world.

But why this attack on Jefferson at this late date? Because he was the first to expose the fake front of the Marbury case, and the first to deny the right of the Court, under the Constitution, to set aside the acts of Congress.

The whole argument developed by these two gentlemen is that the Supreme Court, by implication, has the right under the Constitution to set aside acts of Congress, although this power by implication was denied by the very judge who wrote the first opinion assuming such power; and, if not by implication, then because of constant usage and the fact that the Court has exercised this power for over 100 years should give to the Court the right to set aside acts of Congress, regardless of whether or not the Court ever had such power or whether or not such power was ever intended to be given to this Court under the Constitution.

In other words, the continued violation of the Constitution by the Court is presumed to give the Court jurisdiction to set aside acts of Congress. This would be equivalent to a man driving an automobile over a highway at an excessive rate of speed, violating speed regulations for a long-continued period of time, and then, when finally apprehended and brought to justice, defend his action by saying, "Yes; I knew this was a violation of the law, but I have been violating it for the last 10 years, so nothing can be done with me now; I have a right to violate the law."

It is also contended by these men that Congress is a political body but our great Court is not a political body at all. At least one of the gentlemen says "the Court is presumed not to be a political body"; yet in his argument he admits the Chief Justice rendered the Marbury decision "because he was seeking a political advantage." And then it is asked, "When has the Court exercised any political views in passing upon these questions?"

I imagine none are so well able to judge upon this question as the members of the Court themselves. The minority opinions in the cases setting aside acts of Congress are replete with the assertions of able judges that the Court was not exercising a judicial function in setting aside acts of Congress, but were so deciding because they did not believe in the political theory or the economics expressed by the bill they were seeking to nullify.

In the case of Adkins against Childrens Hospital, Chief Justice Taft said:

> It is not the function of this Court to hold congressional acts invalid simply because they are passed to carry out economic views which the Court believes to be unwise or unsound.

In the case of the Standard Oil Co. against the United States, Justice Harlan declared that—

> The Court by its decisions, when interpreted by the language of its opinion in this case, has not only upset the long unsettled interpretation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, but has usurped the constitutional functions of the legislative branch of the Government.

Continuing further he declares:

> There is a harmful tendency in the Court to bring about the amendment of constitutions and legislative enactments by means alone of judicial construction.

I again call your attention to the title of this case—Standard Oil against United States.

Justice Harlan again declared in the case of Pollock against Farmers Loan & Trust Co. that the Court by its prevailing opinion in that case had rendered it necessary to amend the Constitution to secure principles of right and justice, and the Court had enforced its economic consideration rather than law.

If the gentlemen have any further doubt about the exercises of the Court of its political views rather than the real expressions of law, let them further read the dissenting opinions of Justice Holmes and other Judges who sat on the bench, who knew the political views of the various Judges, and certainly knew what actuated them in their decisions.

But the gentlemen say, "If the Court cannot set aside acts of Congress, who is to decide?" Who but the people should decide in a "government of the people, by the people, for the people"? This is not a monarchy of despotic powers. This is a republic which is controlled by the views of the majority. The views of the majority cannot be heard and cannot prevail if any department—regardless of how small or large—can say that the will of the people is wrong and the will of the people shall be destroyed.

During the 150 years of our Government not one case passing upon an act of Congress can be cited to as a willful attempt by Congress to subvert the Constitution. Most of the important cases passed upon by the Court on this question were by divided opinion, clearly showing there was a question about it, and that somebody was wrong. Can it be that one member of a court who swings the majority of opinion of such court can always be right, and the majority of the American people wrong?

I believe it was the intention of the founders of this Government that the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of laws was to be finally decided by the people in the election of their Representatives to Congress. I believe the people of the United States can be trusted to defeat any party or any Member of Congress who would dare attempt to upset, overrule, and destroy their great Constitution. Holding these views, of course, I believe the people alone have the final right to determine whether or not an act passed by the Congress of the United States is right or wrong.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSAY. If the gentleman will wait until I get through I shall be very glad to yield for any question he wishes to ask.

I believe there is some ground for the argument that probably the Court, after a full hearing, would be in a better position to determine whether or not an act of Congress is in contravention of the Constitution. But I believe if such act is in contravention of the Constitution it would necessarily be so plain that every man who is qualified to sit as a member of the United States Court would be able to observe and detect that violation, and that it should not be so determined by a vote of 5 to 4 or 6 to 3.

The Court has laid down in a thousand cases a rule to be followed by it, when setting aside acts of legislature, that all doubt must be resolved in favor of the act of legislature, and if there is any doubt in the minds of the Court, whether or not the act is constitutional or otherwise, that doubt shall be resolved in favor of the act of the legislature. Yet in the same case, in the very next breath—by a decision of 5 to 4—the Court creates the greatest doubt possible about the validity of the act.

Personally, I do not believe it is necessary to pass any constitutional amendment to correct this obvious unsound principle of decision.

Section 2 of article 3 of the Constitution provides:

> That in all appellate cases the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, under such exceptions and regulations as the Congress shall make.

True, Congress, under this provision, would have no right to disturb the original jurisdiction of the Court, and would also permit any State of the Union to bring before the Court any act of Congress of the United States which interferes with its State regulations and powers.

But I take it Congress has the right to regulate the manner in which a decision in appellate cases could be had. If this be true, then why not remove this doubt; also the fear of the American people that the Supreme Court of the United States does not act in a judicial capacity, but acts in a political capacity when it divides, according to its economic opinions, when passing upon acts of Congress.

Let us do our duty; let us protect the American people and the Constitution of the United States, and by statute require the Court to agree by unanimous vote, or at least by a 7 to 2 vote, before it can destroy and set aside the acts of this great body.

For more than a hundred years the Congress of the United States has exercised such power. It has fixed by judicial act that six judges shall constitute a quorum, and that one judge may issue certain orders or writs of the Court. Did the Congress of the United States trespass upon the powers and privileges of the Supreme Court when it made such regulations? I think not, and if it did not, then clearly the Congress of the United States have the right to require a preponderance of the views of this Court before it destroys the acts of this body.

The provision giving to Congress the right to make exceptions and reservations as to the appellate powers of the Supreme Court has always been in the Constitution.

The Congress of the United States have been negligent in not passing before this time some act regulating the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

It is clearly the duty of Congress to enact legislation to bring into power these provisions of the Constitution. First, so that we may be able to enact laws expressed by the majority of the people; and, secondly, so we may bring about a better feeling and restore confidence among the people in the belief that the Supreme Court of the United States is not always seeking to destroy the acts of Congress which the people are demanding.

We know that within the last 10 years the belief in the infallibility of the Supreme Court has been losing caste among the people.

Let us, by a mere simple act of Congress, restore to the Congress of the United States its prerogative and its powers to enact legislation and at the same time restore to the American people the full confidence and love of our American institutions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. RAMSAY. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has made a very interesting speech, presenting views that I know a very respectable element of the country hold, but with which I do not agree. The gentleman stated that it is his opinion the validity of acts of Congress, so far as constitutionality is concerned, should be passed upon by the people, and in this connection I would like to know by what means would the gentleman submit to the people the question of the constitutionality of every act that Congress may pass that is questioned upon that grounds?

Mr. RAMSAY. I thought I had made myself clear on that.

Mr. COX. I regret that the gentleman was not entirely clear to me on that point.

Mr. RAMSAY. I said by the election of their representatives to Congress.

Mr. COX. Very well. Congress adopts an act, and a question as to its validity is raised——

Mr. RAMSAY. Yes; that is always done.

Mr. COX. How would the gentleman submit it? Would he submit to the people the question of passing upon the legality of an act of Congress?

Mr. RAMSAY. No; I would submit it in this way. If I vote for a law that is clearly unconstitutional, when I go back home that question is going to be raised, and if I do that I know that I am not coming back.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSAY. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. It would seem to me that that would be a most unsafe procedure, because many issues enter into every election. For instance, in the old days the tariff might have been the controlling factor in a particular district, and then in these troublous days the question of strikes and labor might be the real question on which a Member is elected or defeated, and incidentally there will be no way of determining what the people think about the particular act in question. Let us take the gentleman's own district. He is very much beloved by all of his people, and rightfully so. I imagine they would elect him to Congress regardless of whether he is for the Supreme Court or against it.

Mr. RAMSAY. I do not think so.

Mr. MICHENER. Could we get a fair appraisal of what the people think of the Constitution when personalities as in the gentleman's own district enter into the election?

Mr. RAMSAY. We usually get the response of the people upon any legislation or upon any theory of legislation. That is what we submit in the general election. We submit a platform and the gentleman from Michigan, I suppose, has had to contend with the fact that he supported this bill or opposed this measure, and he went before his people on that question.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; but it seems to me that deciding whether a law is constitutional is of such vital importance to the structure of our Government that it should be passed upon by itself without other influences intervening.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr RAMSAY. Yes.

Mr. COX. I take it that the gentleman voted for most if not for all the legislation which has been upset by the Supreme Court in the past 2 years.

Mr. RAMSAY. Not all, but mostly all.

Mr. COX. Did the gentleman vote for N. R. A.?

Mr. RAMSAY. Yes.

Mr. COX. That legislation came before the House prior to the last general election in which the gentleman was a candidate?

Mr. RAMSAY. Yes.

Mr. COX. The Supreme Court held the N. R. A. unconstitutional and still the gentleman is back here.

Mr. RAMSAY. That is right.

Mr. COX. In view of what the gentleman has said by way of appreciation of so-called progressive members of the Supreme Court, is the gentleman now contending that the N. R. A. was in fact constitutional?

Mr. RAMSAY. I am not contending that it was or was not. I do not think the trouble arose with the N. R. A. about the passage of the act. I think the trouble with the N. R. A. was the enforcement of the act in undertaking to extend it too far by the enforcement officers.

Mr. COX. Did the gentleman's violation of the Constitution in voting for N. R. A. have any influence whatever in the last general election in which the gentleman was a successful contender?

Mr. RAMSAY. That I could not tell. I know they fought me on that question. They raised this question on me, and my reply to that was, and my reply to it now is, that I am in favor of the principles that were set forth in the N. R. A.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean to state to this committee seriously that he is in favor of pushing Federal power to the point of complete control of production?

Mr. RAMSAY. I am in favor of pushing Federal power to control commerce where it interferes with interstate commerce.

Mr. COX. But the question of production control reaches every activity of life. Does the gentleman not appreciate the fact that to extend Federal power to that point will mean that Congress has Federalized not only the property of the people, but their lives as well?

Mr. RAMSAY. No. I do not appreciate that at all. I believe that the production of coal and the production of steel, among these great industries, which goes into every State in the Union and affects their trade and commerce, ought to be under the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. COX. Let me take the gentleman back to the proposition which he announced, which was that the constitutionality of acts of Congress should be passed upon by the people. The gentleman said that that question would be raised when Members came up for reelection.

Mr. RAMSAY. That is right.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman think that his people returned him by an enlarged majority upon the position which he took upon that particular measure?

Mr. RAMSAY. I do not know why they returned me, but let me answer the gentleman. The gentleman is attacking the theory that in this country the people govern. I presume the gentleman is acquainted with the Ogden case, the first case that was written by Chief Justice Marshall, on interstate commerce. The attorneys in that case made the same objection that the gentleman is making, and Chief Justice Marshall said:

> You must remember that this is a republic and that the Court cannot always act; that certain questions in this country, like in any republic, must be finally submitted to the people in the return of their Members to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COX. Now, what, in the opinion of the gentleman is "commerce"?

Mr. RAMSAY. I do not have time to discuss that now. I will discuss that matter at some other time if the gentleman desires. I have my views about it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would not inflict myself again upon the House except there seems to be plenty of time for discussion this afternoon.

I am to talk on a subject about which you or I—you will probably agree—know but little. It is generally agreed that few, if any, of us know much about money problems.

The gist of these few remarks will relate to the great necessity of balancing the Budget. The President recently gave us a Budget message, in which he set forth the probable receipts and expenditures for the next 18 months. One new Member, when asked about it, said he did not understand it, but was told the figures were only guesses and would soon be forgotten. I do not intend that the recent Budget guesses shall be forgotten.

I should like to erect a scarecrow calling attention to the necessity of balancing the Budget. You on the Democratic side dress the scarecrow up so beautifully that it seems not to frighten the Nation particularly.

A farmer asked his wife if she had not some proper clothes for a scarecrow that he wished to erect. She said, "Take Johnny's plus-fours." He said, "I want to scare the crows. I do not want to make them laugh." [Laughter.]

A little less than 2 years ago, during the banking discussion of 1935, Governor Eccles was before the Committee on Banking and Currency. Less than 2 years ago in a meeting of that committee I said to Governor Eccles:

> You have no particular fear of a $40,000,000,000 national debt?

He replied:

> I have no fear of a $40,000,000,000 national debt.

I said:

> Your answer staggers me. I have.

A little later Governor Eccles said:

> The budget of any government must be balanced over a period of time. There is no question about that.

I then asked:

> Would you suggest 5 years?

And he replied:

> I would say it might be desirable over a 5-year period, but it would not be necessarily fatal over a 10-year period.

Then he went on to discuss, if you please, the taking of recoverables into account. When the debt was only $28,000,000,000 at that particular time, he reminded us of the billion and a half cash on hand and our equities in the capital stock and securities of the governmental organizations which we had set up. I wish to remind you that we have now a $35,000,000,000 debt. All of the $10,000,000,000 that we appropriated last year probably has not yet been spent, although it has been obligated. It is not really a $35,000,000,000 debt; it will be much more. It will probably be quite a great deal more. I recently suggested, after reading the President's statement of recoverables, that you analyze them.

Although the Treasury statements inform you that we have $5,000,000,000 in recoverables, we do not actually have even $3,000,000,000. Also we have a contingent debt of about $5,000,000,000. We can be sung no lullaby about that. Those are the facts. The Treasury carries book value only in their reports and not the true value of many of those so-called assets. No plus-fours on this scarecrow this afternoon!

I do not wish you to feel that I am too badly wrought up over it, because I am today rejoicing with you that Governor Eccles seems now to have awakened to the very grave danger that impends. Instead of complacently waiting for a 10-year period in which to balance the Budget, he now demands a balanced Budget in 1938 or taxes enough to make unnecessary any further borrowing.

In the last few days he has issued the order that in March, and not later than May, the excess reserves of member banks shall be frozen to the limit provided by law and that they shall not be allowed to be used for purposes that might lead to inflation.

Is he frightened? I hope that he is. I rejoice that he has finally awakened to the gravity of the situation. He has gone the limit of the power given him by Congress to freeze those reserves. He tells you, however, not to be worried; that they may resort to open-market operations sufficient to control conditions. Enough securities will be placed on the market to absorb future excess reserves. And as a last resort the Board will raise interest rates, which would probably be effective. But this last instrumentality of control would be one of doubtful favorable results.

When I came here in 1922 gentlemen from Alabama, Iowa, Nebraska, and other States complained that the Federal Reserve Board's action in contracting credit, calling loans made during the war, and raising interest rates had practically ruined their section of the country. The Federal Reserve Board had power in those days, but in 1935 we gave them enormous power, and they are now using it. How many of us understand the workings of the Federal Reserve Board, I wonder? They are proceeding to free $1,500,000,000 more money of their member banks. What are they going to do with that money? What amount of Federal securities do they already have in their portfolios? I think it is about $2,400,000,000.

Can the Board force member banks to purchase Government securities in these open-market operations? The question is rather interesting, is it not? But we know that the Federal Reserve member banks today have 69 percent—the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] yesterday said 60 percent—of their investment in United States securities or those which have been guaranteed by the Federal Government.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Gladly.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that 69 percent of the Government bonds are held by member banks of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. GIFFORD. No, indeed; I will quote the gentleman my authority. I do not want to give a definite answer unless I have authority for it.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman made the statement.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will quote it for the gentleman; I am looking for my authority.

The gentleman from Texas yesterday made the statement that he was surprised that the big bankers had come to the Republican Party and demanded something. He was "surprised" they did it. He did not say they had come, but that is his method of making an assumption appear as a fact.

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not like to say a thing without authority. I will read my authority. I called the Federal Reserve Board this morning. One of their representatives came up to my office and we checked up on all of this.

Mr. PATMAN. That 69 percent of the Government bonds are held by member banks with the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. GIFFORD. No. That member banks of the Federal Reserve System hold Government bonds to the amount of 69 percent of their investments.

Mr. PATMAN. That is different.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. PATMAN. Did not the gentleman say that the member banks of the Federal Reserve System owned 69 percent of the Government bonds?

Mr. GIFFORD. No. Sixty-nine percent of the investments of the member banks are in United States securities and securities guaranteed; and 42 percent of their loans and investments are in United States securities.

Mr. PATMAN. That is not the way I understood it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Now, Governor Eccles seems to be frightened. As I stated, this is somewhat reassuring. What, however, will happen to some of our small member banks that will be obliged to carry so much idle money with the Reserve bank? The other day I saw reports of a large Washington bank showing, as I recall it, that 66 percent of their assets were in United States bonds. And the gentleman from Texas said the other day that they were doing no business except for trading in such securities.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I think the gentleman and I are talking about different things. I said that about 60 percent of the Government bonds are owned by the banks of the country. The gentleman is talking about the investment of banks and not the percentage of bonds that are owned by all banks.

Mr. GIFFORD. Exactly. I am talking about member banks at the moment, member banks of the Federal Reserve System. I wonder if the gentleman will agree with me that the Reserve banks have such control over the member banks as to force them to buy United States securities in open-market operations? In my section the banks are very careful not to carry such large percentages of United States securities. Pressure apparently has not been exerted upon them; but what I do desire to know is: Can pressure be exerted upon them to make them buy something they do not wish to acquire? Presumably force could not be used but it would probably be "just too bad" if they did not cooperate.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that the banks are anxious to obtain these bonds, that they do not have to exert pressure upon banks to take the bonds, but that it is a question of the banks' being so anxious for them that in order for the Treasury to keep from favoring one over another they must allocate the bonds to the various banks?

Mr. GIFFORD. The banks in my vicinity do not want them in such great quantities. They seem to have refused to become overloaded with them. I observe in their reports that they have a small percentage as compared with what the larger banks in the cities seem to have.

It is well known that many large business corporations do not need again to depend on the banks to finance their operations.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What is the present condition of the banks as compared with March 4, 1933, and the confidence of the people?

Mr. GIFFORD. The banks at present seem to have the confidence of the people, unquestionably. But I wish to heaven that we knew what the amount of the Government debt will continue to be. If our Government will remain stable and those bonds which represent only debt will continue to hold the confidence we still have in the Government, apparently we are to be safe. But that 69 percent of investment is really only evidence of debt. If a bank lends you money for a year you are expected to pay it back out of business operations. If you lend your Government money, you know it must borrow again to pay it, unless it uses the taxing power to provide the necessary funds, which we hesitate to do. You cannot collect and you know the Government cannot procure the money except through its power to borrow again, or to inflict excessive taxes on the people.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact you can determine confidence by price, so compare the price of Government bonds today with the price of Government bonds in 1933?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; you cannot do that when money is so eager for investment. If my banker lends me a hundred thousand dollars, my note is carried as an asset in that bank and as a deposit. I spend the money and most of it is in turn deposited by others. The bank still has my note, and it also has the money that has been redeposited. Then the bank takes my hundred-thousand-dollar note to the Federal Reserve, discounting it, and has $100,000 to loan again.

If my credit is still believed to be good it will be willing to loan me this second $100,000. This process can be followed indefinitely, so long as my credit is regarded as satisfactory.

Thus with Government operations, more and more reserves created by debt and banks desirous to have the Government keep borrowing. Government credit must be kept good, even if artificial means are used to "rig the market." There is a limit, however. Are we reaching it? Many a banker might well be loath to inform his depositors regarding the amount of Government debt which has been assumed with their money.

Governor Eccles says we have now exhausted the provisions of the law to freeze these reserves and, when necessary, will try open-market operations. But he asserts that we must balance the Budget in 1938, because further borrowings will add to the inflation base, which he now regards as dangerous. In view of what he said early in 1935, what a change there has been in less than 2 short years. What a change in his statement of recoverables, when we now must fully realize they are less than $3,000,000,000.

However, the President estimates that in 1938 we are to have receipts of $7,000,000,000, and he states how all of it must be spent. I tried to show you the other day that the $7,000,000,000 was for a Government Budget permanently established. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] on yesterday reiterated that statement. The President says he can balance the Budget in 1938, except that some $1,500,000,000 must be used for relief and recovery. That would take all in excess of the regular expenses of the Government, leaving $400,000,000 to be found for reduction of the debt under the existing law. He made as good a guess as is possible as to receipts and expenditures. I dread to think, however, what other appropriations will be made by the Congress before June 30, 1938, to upset even that $7,000,000,000 estimate.

Let me call attention to one item in the Budget: $806,000,000 to be taken in under the operations of the Social Security Act and only about $400,000,000 to be paid out. This difference is already placed in the expenditure column and not set aside for the fund. Is not that interesting to you? Is that the policy to be adopted permanently? Yet some of you criticize us on this side of the House for saying that this money ought to be "nailed down" for that particular fund. As William Green says, "It ought to be nailed down." He evidently does not trust us with the spending of it for ordinary expenses. But your President has already provided in his Budget to spend it for such purposes.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman know just what percentage of the outstanding deficit of the Government is accounted for in the relief activities of the Government?

Mr. GIFFORD. No.

Mr. MAY. And what percentage in the regular establishments of the Government?

Mr. GIFFORD. I know that in 1930 the debt was the lowest since 1917—namely, $16,000,000,000—and when Mr. Hoover retired from the Presidency it was only twenty-two and a half billion dollars with $2,000,000,000 acknowledged as recoverables. In 4 short years it has gone to $35,000,000,000, with possibly three billions in recoverables.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take up another matter. A new method has been devised by the Federal Reserve Board. As gold has been coming into the country it has added much to the dangerous reserves and there is a new process now being worked out. It will add only once and not 12 times to the inflation base. But, nevertheless, we have to issue bonds, which means additional debt, in order to buy the gold. The President warned us that the debt would be increased if this plan were carried out. Of course, that adds somewhat to the inflation base.

I hope the country will be aroused to this situation. I can quote many authorities who are greatly disturbed over it. You might naturally not believe me. Would you listen to them? Our good friend Lewis Douglas fled the Treasury and told you what must surely happen. But you have gone three times as far on that road as even he probably expected you would go when he retired, refusing to be a party to the proceedings. Then Mr. Coolidge took hasty leave of the Treasury. He departed and made speeches carrying warnings to the same effect. He even left the Democratic Party. He warned us that Government borrowings must stop. Where is Professor Sprague, and others, who formerly advised the Treasury? Who are advising now? Whoever is there must apparently carry out the will of one man, and that man is the President of the United States. I would not weary you this afternoon, but you must not forget those speeches that the President made in 1932 telling you that if the banks had to continue to take over further debt it would ruin them. He also told you how dreadful it would be to add any more taxes, which were paid "in the sweat of every man's brow."

We should reread the speeches he made in 1932 on these subjects. We might then well be forced to make up our own minds that he knows little or nothing about money. On the contrary, he has some ideas that seem so absolutely wrong that he is not to be trusted in monetary matters. You cannot read those speeches and then observe what he has afterward done and accept the one excuse, "to save a starving people." All of this money has not been spent for starving people. We will take time some day to recite to you how the money has been spent, and we will show you that in reality not a large proportion thereof has been spent for starving people. Of course, a portion of it has been spent for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I am not criticizing the action of the Federal Reserve Board. I approve. I am glad they are awake to the conditions. However, it is a recent awakening. I hope it is not too late. I desire here this morning in making these remarks is to plead with you to stop this lavish spending of money. We have to balance that Budget or suffer severe consequences. Even Governor Eccles admits we must do that. If we do not, certainly there is grave danger ahead. What we have already done in passing legislation allowing the Federal Reserve some control is not enough. Our actual receipts and expenditures must be brought into balance.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the parading of the gentleman's "scarecrow", and the repetition of his campaign speech, typical of thousands of similar campaign speeches made during the last election, would not have caused me to come to the Well of the House, but so long as I am a Member of this body and so long as the present Chief Executive is in the White House, no Member can stand in this Well and say that the President cannot be trusted, as long as I have a voice to protest against it. [Applause.]

If the gentleman from Texas was surprised when the bankers went to the Republican leaders, I want to say to my genial and amiable and personable friend from Massachusetts that I am shocked and distressed that a distinguished and able Member of this body, in view of the mandate of the people which is still playing its requiem in his ears, should stand in the Well of this House and say that the President of the United States cannot be trusted. Who cannot trust him? I do not believe there are many Members in the small remnant that remains on the other side of the Chamber who would rise from their seats and say they cannot trust Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Cannot trust him in what? Will the gentleman continue the statement?

Mr. WOODRUM. I am willing for the gentleman to say that.

Mr. GIFFORD. I stated it, but the gentleman is not repeating my statement. I said he could not be trusted in these monetary matters; that he did not seem to know anything about them.

Mr. WOODRUM. Cannot be trusted in monetary matters!

Mr. GIFFORD. I stand on that.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is about the most important thing about which you have to trust the President of the United States.

Cannot trust him in monetary matters! Why cannot you trust him in monetary matters? Are you afraid of graft and corruption? You are just afraid of ignorance—that he does not know anything about them.

Let us see, Mr. Chairman, whether he knows anything about monetary matters. In the days of Mr. Hoover we had then the "better minds" in control of the Government. They did not call them "brain trusters" then. We had a Congress under the control of the Republicans that would appropriate money to feed mules and horses and chickens and cows but not a dollar to feed starving human beings, and yet with that sort of budget balancing, the Government ran in the hole to the tune of $3,000,000,000.

What has happened now under this leader who does not know anything about money and cannot be trusted in monetary matters? We have spent a few billion dollars in trying to rehabilitate a country stricken by those years of misconception of government. This job has been done. It has been done splendidly and magnificently and to the satisfaction of practically all of the American people, and with a degree of unanimity never before witnessed. Two States in the Union could not trust the President. The great State of Massachusetts had no trouble about trusting him in 1936.

Under this leader, who knew nothing about monetary matters, who cannot be trusted, what has happened? With the spending of a few billion dollars we have relieved the American people, rehabilitated business and industry, opened closed banks, and saved the depositors who had lost their money under the gentleman's prior administration. We have fed hungry people, we have put people to work, and what else has happened? Our national wealth, while our Government debt was increasing a few billion dollars, has gone from $25,000,000,000 to $60,000,000,000. The national income of the country has trebled while the national debt was piling up a little bit, and now increased incomes and increased revenues pouring into the Treasury are bringing us rapidly to the point where there can be a balanced Budget, if that is possible. I do not know what day this can be accomplished. As one Member of the Congress, I am not willing to accomplish it today or tomorrow if it means the bringing of suffering to the American people. I do not believe any vast number of American people want this done, but I do think there is a duty devolving upon this Congress to drive to that end, in order that we may bring our expenditures down as fast as this can be done; and this is being done in every department and in every branch of the Government.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Would my friend the gentleman from Virginia care to have me suggest that under the "bad management" of the present President of the United States our gold reserve is the largest it has ever been in history, and Government bonds sell more readily on the market and at a higher premium than ever before?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; everybody knows we have prospered and we have progressed and we have recovered except my friend from Massachusetts and, perhaps, one or two of the gentlemen who applauded his remarks. [Laughter.] Everybody else knows it. Everybody else is happy and satisfied. Business has prospered and there is now a new song in the hearts of the people. All of this has been done under the leadership of a man "you cannot trust in monetary matters."

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has referred to political speeches that I, perhaps, made. I simply wish to say that this is the same lullaby that you and others have been making during all this time. It is nothing but a lullaby. We know what these reserves are and they are debts—Government debts. They are your reserves.

Mr. WOODRUM. When my good friend stands before the American people today and tells them they cannot trust Franklin D. Roosevelt, he is as one crying in the wilderness.

Mr. GIFFORD. On monetary matters.

Mr. WOODRUM. On anything. You may disagree with him.

I have disagreed with him. Disagree with him all you please, but do not let that stay in the RECORD. Where you tell us that you do not trust him, it has a bad effect. I would not dare to stand in the Well here and say that I would not trust the President of the United States.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. What words would the gentleman suggest that would please him?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman might say that he disagreed with the economic or monetary policies of the President. That would be a dignified remark.

Mr. GIFFORD. I might say that I am very fearful of his policies.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think that would be very much better.

Mr. GIFFORD. Then I shall gladly change it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I have thus far hesitated to take up the time of the House on a matter which is of vital importance to the people of the Territory of Hawaii while the House has been engaged in the consideration of urgent legislation of national import. But I feel it is due to the people of my district to call your attention to the results in Hawaii of the maritime strike on the west coast that has now been in existence for over 3 months, but which happily seems about to end. Our difficulties are proportionately greater than that of other communities affected, because of our isolation and entire dependence upon ocean-borne commerce for our trade with the mainland of the United States and the rest of the world.

We are quite properly included within the provisions of the coastwise navigation laws. Neither freight nor passengers may be carried between Hawaiian and other American ports by foreign vessels, except upon the payment of very heavy penalties. The tariff laws of the United States naturally extend to include Hawaii, so that importations from foreign countries pay the usual customs duties.

Hawaii as an incorporated territory is completely a part of the American domestic economy, and its trade and commerce are on exactly the same basis as that of any other part of the United States. Our location, however, some 2,091 nautical miles from San Francisco, carries with it special burdens and problems when American shipping is for any reason not available. With the American Flag practically driven off the Pacific Ocean, and with no alternative means of transportation such as are ready at hand to mainland communities, we have indeed been strikebound, and would have literally starved to death had it not been for foreign shipping.

Since the commencement of the strike on October 28, 1936, there has been an almost complete dislocation of our closely knit business relations with the mainland. We have been forced to import the greater amount of our foodstuffs, in which we are not selfsufficient, from foreign sources. Between November 1, 1936, and January 19, 1937, approximately 45,000 tons of merchandise have been so imported. Thirty-six thousand tons came from Japan and China, 8,400 tons from Canada, and 600 tons from Australia. These importations were principally of necessary foodstuffs, with a small amount of emergency merchandise. As foreign goods they were required to pay the regular tariffs on the respective commodities, amounting to approximately $800,000 for the period named, more than double the normal customs receipts for a like period. Naturally this increase of approximately a half million dollars has been passed on to the consumer, causing a tremendous increase in the cost of living.

A survey of the present costs of staple goods prepared by the University of Hawaii shows a range of increase of from 15 to 215 percent since the beginning of the strike. To illustrate, a wire from the Board of Supervisors of the County of Hawaii states that onions are selling at 25 cents per pound; rice at $9 per bag, the usual price being about $4; and Irish potatoes also at $9 per bag, the usual price being $3 or less.

Naturally the greater hardships brought about by this increase in the cost of living bears heaviest on those least able to afford it. As to luxuries, there are none. Oranges and lemons are selling at 10 cents apiece or more, and many fruits and vegetables are simply not on the market.

Many foods essential for convalescents or patients in hospitals cannot be obtained, to the detriment of the health of infants and the sick.

A serious shortage of feed for livestock and poultry, which we normally import, has decreased the milk supply and, I am informed, has caused the slaughter of many small herds and poultry flocks. Here again the loss is borne by those who were just building up small dairy and chicken ranches.

While these conditions are of more immediate consideration, the disruption of trade in general is of a character that may have lasting effects. We have in the past bought practically all of our merchandise from the mainland. We have purchased annually an average of nearly three-quarters of a million dollars of American cement, at a greater cost than similar cement could be bought from foreign sources even with the tariff added to the price. We buy our fertilizers entirely through American firms, a business amounting to $6,000,000 annually, the greater part of which is for American-produced ingredients, even when some of the same ingredients could be obtained from foreign countries at less cost. The necessity of importing these articles, and many others that might be enumerated, from foreign countries because of the strike may lead to a permanent diversion of this business from American industry.

On the other hand, American merchandise in which there is no foreign competition has been available in only small quantities from east coast ports, a few vessels having been able to clear from the east coast for Hawaii through the Panama Canal during the strike. Naturally these imports have had to bear higher freight rates. In some cases west coast business houses have shipped their goods by rail across the continent for transfer to such vessels destined for Hawaii in order to hold their Hawaiian business, requiring a routing of 10,000 miles in place of the normal 2,100.

We had been experiencing up to the commencement of the strike a very real revival of building, including a healthy increase in small-home construction. The strike is hampering and delaying this revival because of the lack of building materials. I am in receipt of wires which state that major public and private construction jobs will be halted for the same reason. A direct result will be the laying off of hundreds of men engaged in building and construction jobs. A corollary of our inability to bring in the foods and goods we need is a total stoppage of our exports. The principal source of livelihood of our population comes from the sale of our two principal products, sugar and pineapples, to which may be added many smaller commodities that support smaller groups of people. Because no American ships were leaving Hawaii for the last 2 months of 1936, we had 26,482 tons deducted from our sugar quota for that year, meaning a loss to us of approximately $2,000,000. In the meanwhile thousands of tons of sugar and thousands of cases of pineapples are awaiting shipment on our wharves. The manufacture of fiber board from bagasse is one of our promising smaller industries. The lack of ships on which to export its goods will soon cause, if it has not already caused, the factory producing this fiber board to close down and throw its entire force of some 200 men out of work. Any longer continuation of the maritime strike will threaten the livelihood of the entire community, so dependent upon the steady flow of goods by water.

Under the coastwise navigation laws, devised for the protection of American shipping from the competition of foreign vessels in the trade between American ports, those who were under the necessity of traveling to or from Hawaii since the tie-up have been forced to use such foreign vessels. In doing so they have incurred the fine or penalty of $200, in addition to the regular fare, charged for each passenger carried by a foreign vessel between American ports. Some 270 persons have paid $54,000 in fines. This number includes many visitors vacationing in Hawaii, who could only return to their mainland residences on foreign ships; and many island people, marooned on the mainland and unable to get back except by the same means. Among the latter was the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Hawaii; and likewise several people of quite moderate means, to whom the penalty was a very severe financial burden. Surely a fine imposed for the protection of even a temporarily nonexistent American merchant marine can hardly be justified.

Of course, the lack of American shipping has practically ruined our tourist business for this season. Hawaii is both a winter and a summer resort. Hundreds had planned to spend some portion of this winter in Hawaii and have been forced to make other arrangements because of the strike. Our local tourist bureau estimates the loss will exceed $2,000,000.

I speak more particularly for the community I represent in the effort to paint the picture of how this strike has hurt us. Greater aggregate losses have been experienced by west coast communities, but perhaps no greater in proportion, and a substantial part of these losses comes directly from the interruption of the close economic relations between Hawaii and the west coast.

The Territory of Hawaii's buying power is estimated at $80,000,000 to $90,000,000 a year, nearly all of which is spent on the mainland. Most of this money is spent on the Pacific coast, though much of it goes for eastern manufactured goods purchased through Pacific coast firms.

Our normal requirements of a few of the principal foodstuffs, which we usually purchase from California, amounts for the items for which I have procured estimates to a total in dollar value of $910,233 a month. Since the strike has been in progress for more than 3 months, the loss in these items alone already amounts to more than $2,750,000. Additional items other than those for which I have obtained approximate figures would greatly increase this loss to the farmers and merchants of California.

I am in receipt of a wire from San Francisco which states that the approximate shipments to Hawaii during the 3-month period from November through January in 1935 amounted to 69,000 tons, valued at $4,500,000, exclusive of petroleum products; and that imports from Hawaii for the same period totaled 190,000 tons, valued at $11,800,000. The whole of this trade has been stopped by the strike. A similar wire from Los Angeles states that a conservative estimate of the nonrecoverable losses of consumable merchandise borne by southern California firms through inability to make shipments of foodstuffs to Hawaii exceeds $2,000,000. Our volume of business with Oregon and Washington is not as great as that with California. However, we do depend upon the Northwest for most of our lumber and a considerable amount of our foods, some of which are shipped through San Francisco and some directly through Seattle and Portland. A wire from Portland states that it has lost approximately $250,000 of business with Hawaii because of the strike. I have no data on the losses incurred by Seattle.

California manufacturers have taken and are taking heroic measures to hold their rich trade with the islands. They fear that if their brands once get off the shelves and their customers become accustomed to some other brands it will be very difficult to win them back. With this in view, one large San Francisco paint manufacturer recently shipped two cars of paints by rail to Baltimore for reshipment by boat through the Panama Canal to Honolulu. One California spice and baking manufacturer has shipped three cars of his goods by rail to New York for reshipment to Honolulu, and a San Francisco chocolate manufacturer shipped one car of his goods by the same 10,000-mile route.

Because of the stoppage of raw-sugar shipments the two big California cane-sugar refineries, one of them the largest refinery in the world, are closed down, thus throwing 2,700 persons out of employment in San Francisco and Crockett.

The latter town of 5,000 persons is almost solely dependent on the big California and Hawaiian refinery for its economic existence. Due to the cessation of shipments, supplies of canned pineapple and canned pineapple juice in California are very low, and it will soon be necessary, if these goods are to be kept on San Francisco grocery shelves, to ship the canned pineapple from Honolulu, through the Canal, to New York and bring them back across the continent by rail. This means an extra cost in haulage alone of about 35 cents a case, or a cent and a half a can.

Cutting off of Hawaiian tourist business naturally means a terrific loss to California hotels, restaurants, and taxicab companies catering to this business while in transit through Californian ports—a loss which runs into many thousands of dollars a month, for which no figures are available.

The whole story, of course, is told in the export and import figures for Hawaii. Hawaii imported $78,924,776 worth of goods from the mainland and exported $98,695,969 worth of its products to the mainland in 1935. While some business is now being transacted through New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Canadian ports, it is a mere bagatelle compared with the normal flow of traffic between the mainland and the islands.

These partial estimates of the losses incurred by the people of Hawaii will, when more accurately determined, exceed $10,000,000. At the same time the American farmers and businessmen of the west coast irrevocably lost almost an equal sum through the disruption of its trade with Hawaii. Unfortunately, the beneficiaries of the strike have been foreign merchants and foreign shipping. By necessity we have had to spend our money in foreign markets for the primary purpose of obtaining food and to as little degree as possible to provide ourselves with other urgently needed commodities.

I have not discussed the direct losses to the shipping industry itself, nor the great losses suffered by American industry as a whole, estimated to exceed three-quarters of a billion dollars, but have restricted myself to the disastrous effects on Hawaii and to those who have close relations with the islands.

When a community has experienced a serious disruption of its normal life the reaction affects all human endeavor. My emphasis on figures is only because these data are a measure of the distress and suffering of our people and not because the statistics themselves are necessarily important. I bespeak your consideration of the human element behind these figures for a people faced by a situation over which they have no control and enduring a plight becoming every day more urgent.

If the very encouraging news as to the probable termination of the strike within the next few days should prove premature, I ask that Congress consider some immediate relief for Hawaii to keep the cost of living within the reach of the mass of our people and to provide transportation for those required to travel to and from the islands. In any case I urge that the penalties collected from those forced to use foreign vessels during this emergency be remitted. I have introduced a bill for that purpose, which is now before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The intolerable situation in which Hawaii has been placed has greatly alarmed our community. I believe legislation that will grant discretionary power to the President of the United States, applicable to the incorporated Territories of Alaska and Hawaii and to the noncontiguous Territories, to prevent the recurrence of this condition, should be enacted into law by this Congress. Existing emergency powers do not quite cover this kind of a situation. Future controversies between operators and maritime unions may isolate not only Hawaii but also Alaska, which, indeed, has been equally affected by the present strike, or Puerto Rico and the smaller communities under the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK].

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I was very much interested this afternoon in most, if not all, of the speeches. I wish it were possible in the next 4 or 6 weeks to require the attendance of every Member of the House of Representatives in this Hall and not permit the consideration of any detailed legislation at all, but to talk about the things that we ought to talk about, that are of vital interest to the welfare of this country.

I am not as optimistic as some of the gentlemen I have heard talk, who say that our troubles are all over and that we have finally passed the danger point. I think there are a lot of things that have not yet been worked out. If we spent the next 6 weeks in talking over these things, I think it would be helpful.

I was much interested in the talk by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RAMSAY] as to what his attitude of mind was on some of the great problems before this country.

I do not know whether you agree with him or not, but I, for one, do not. Whenever you say you want the Congress of the United States to pass any kind of a bill it wants to, and one that will not be subject to review by the United States Supreme Court, I cannot go along. [Applause.]

I do not want to get off onto any other subject, but I want to talk about something else that has been of vital concern.

I intend to discuss today a subject that has been before you and the country on many occasions. I am bringing it to your attention again because I believe it will be a live issue before us in the near future. I noted the other day that our French Ambassador was in conference with the French Government or its representatives, and it was hinted that one of the subjects discussed was the French debt to the United States. Some time ago I noticed an article in the public press which indicated that France was very anxious to have the debt question taken up again. Her object being, of course, to pay as little as possible.

It is for these reasons that I am again bringing this matter to your attention, and in order to present the question clearly it is necessary that I review the history of the war-debt situation, so that you may have a clear picture of the actual facts.

The debts were created because the Allies were unable to supply their needs in the conflict with Germany, and they naturally came to the United States to buy food, ammunition, clothing, and supplies for the Allied Armies. They had no money with which to pay for these supplies at that time, so decided that in lieu of money they would make a promise to pay at some future time.

After the United States became involved, we undertook to handle all their purchases, and in doing so extended credit and specified that they should pay us 5-percent interest.

When the war was over, the United States found herself with outstanding accounts against all the Allied Nations. In order to raise the money to pay for the supplies for these countries it was necessary for us to float Liberty bonds.

In the case of Great Britain, at the close of the war it was disclosed that she owed the United States $4,600,000,000.

Under an act of Congress enacted February 1922, we provided for the World War Foreign Debt Commission, and under this act it was provided that England should pay her debts over a 25-year period with an interest rate of 4¼ percent, which was an interest reduction from the original agreement.

Bonds were issued to the United States Government covering the amount and are now held by the Treasury Department of the United States.

The above-mentioned act was amended February 28, 1923, providing that the interest rate should be reduced from 4¼ to 3 percent from December 1922 to December 1932, and thereafter at the rate of 3½ percent. The payments as to principal and interest to begin in 1923 and to end in 1984, which would mean, if the British Government met its obligations, they would have paid the United States during this period $4,600,000,000 in principal and $6,505,965,000 in interest by the end of the 62-year period.

This is a typical illustration of the debts of all the Allies, except that some of the money was loaned for rehabilitation purposes. The schedule of the debts as applied to all nations will be found in the following table:

Total principal and interest to be paid to the United States by 13 war debtors

Country	Principal	Interest	Total	Average interest rate (approximate) over the whole period of payments, per cent
Great Britain	$4,600,000,000	$6,505,965,000.00	$11,105,965,000.00	3.3
Finland	9,000,000	12,695,055.00	21,695,055.00	3.3
Hungary	1,939,000	2,754,240.00	4,693,240.00	3.3
Poland	178,560,000	257,127,550.00	435,687,550.00	3.3
Estonia	13,830,000	19,501,140.00	33,331,140.00	3.3
Latvia	5,775,000	8,183,635.00	13,958,635.00	3.3
Lithuania	6,030,000	8,501,940.00	14,531,940.00	3.3
Czechoslovakia	115,000,000	197,811,433.88	312,811,433.88	3.3

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. Purely to keep the record straight, as I understand it, Finland owed a small amount and has paid up.

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes. It will be noted that the interest rates were on an average of 3.3 percent for nine nations, and in the case of Belgium, 1.8 percent; France, 1.6 percent; Yugoslavia, 1 percent; and Italy, 0.4 percent.

When the original act was amended providing for a lowering of the interest rate, we canceled in effect 29.8 percent of Finland's debt, 30 percent of Hungary's, 30 percent of Poland's, 29.9 percent of Estonia's, 29.8 percent of Latvia's, 30.5 percent of Lithuania's, 37 percent of Czechoslovakia's, 37.1 percent of Rumania's, 60.3 percent of Belgium's, 60.3 percent of France's, 75.9 percent of Yugoslavia's, 80.2 percent of Italy's, and 30.1 percent of Great Britain's.

The average cancelation of all debts is 51.2 percent, based on the original agreement.

During the last session of Congress we passed a bill revaluing the gold content of the dollar, reading as follows:

The President is authorized by proclamation to fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains nine-tenths fine, and also to fix the weight of the silver dollar in grains nine-tenths fine at a definite fixed ratio in relation to the gold dollar at such amounts as he finds necessary from his investigation to stabilize domestic prices or to protect the foreign commerce against the adverse effect of depreciated foreign currencies, and to provide for the unlimited coinage of such gold and silver at the ratio so fixed, or in case the Government of the United States enters into an agreement with any government or governments under the terms of which the ratio between the value of gold and other currency issued by the United States and by any such government or governments is established, the President may fix the weight of the gold dollar in accordance with the ratio so agreed upon, and such gold dollar, the weight of which is so fixed, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity, but in no event shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed so as to reduce its present weight by more than 50 percent.

The President created a dollar which would permit any of the countries now indebted to us to pay 100 cents of their debt with 59 cents. When this is taken into consideration, Finland can pay her 70 percent of debt remaining with about 42 cents on the dollar. The same applies to Hungary, Poland, Estonia, Lithuania, and Great Britain. Czechoslovakia can pay her 63 percent with about 37 cents on the dollar. The same percentage applies to Rumania. Belgium can pay her 40-percent debt with 24 cents on the dollar; France can pay her 24 percent with 14 cents on the dollar; and Italy can pay her 20 percent with 12 cents on the dollar.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Of course, they have not paid their debt. The people do not realize it, but during the last 2 or 3 years, because of deflation, Germany has paid a debt and gained on the payment $1,000,000,000.

Mr. LAMNECK. They now expect the United States to make a further reduction. The facts of the matter are, they expect to pay very little, if anything.

This attitude is causing some embarrassment as a result of Senate bill 682, Seventy-third Congress, approved April 13, 1934, reading as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States for any person to purchase or sell the bonds, securities, or other obligations of any foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or any organization or association acting for or on behalf of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, issued after the passage of this act, or to make any loan to such foreign government, political subdivision, organization, or association, except a renewal or adjustment of existing indebtedness while such government political subdivision, organization, or association is in default in the payment of its obligations, or any part thereof, to the Government of the United States.

What a godsend that bill has been to the people of this country!

I warn the country and the Congress that to cancel these war debts will positively involve us in another world war. First, because they will again ask for credit, and I am sure we will be gullible enough to extend it. When they refuse to pay a second time, we might be inclined to force collection.

What assurance have we that if we cancel the debts they will pay any future obligations? None, whatsoever.

I am not so sure that our stabilization program with Great Britain and France will not involve us. There has been no public pronouncement as to what our policy is. Do any Members of Congress know anything about our plans to stabilize the currency of the world?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Has the gentleman any information on that subject?

Mr. CULKIN. I think I have. A story is current in Europe and in this country that the Secretary of the Treasury is now buying French paper francs and paying for them in American gold. The story is well accredited, and I agree with the gentleman that that procedure contains within it the seed of war.

Mr. LAMNECK. Not long ago, you will recall, we used our stabilization fund to protect the British pound that Russia offered on world market. What business is it of ours what happens to the British pound if our money is sound? I am sure they do not care what happens to the American dollar and never lose an opportunity to embarrass us any way they can.

I have information, which I consider reliable, indicating that England and other countries are now making heavy investments in American securities. Have you ever thought what would happen in 10 years from now if the European countries some bright sunny morning would dump these securities on an open market; what it would be necessary for us to do in order to protect American securities and American dollars? We would have to use every dollar of American gold to protect the citizen in my humble judgment.

This is England's plan in the future to secure American gold. If we cancel the war debts we will make her job much easier.

A couple of months ago I went to Kentucky to see the place where we are burying the American gold we have on hand, and I was impressed with the thought that the gold, so far as doing humanity any good, is just as worthless as the same tonnage of clay would be from my own State.

The gold does not belong to the United States Government but belongs to the Federal Reserve banks. It is not used for monetary purposes whatsoever. It is not used as a security for currency and it is not being used to promote world trade.

I have said on previous occasions, and I repeat now, that we must eventually settle the monetary question of this country on a sound basis. We must again return to a metal base as a security for currency. We must resume specie payment. We must work out some plan to redistribute the gold throughout the world that will protect American interests. We are becoming so involved in this European intrigue that I am fearful of the results. If you want another war, cancel the war debts, extend credit to defaulters in Europe, and try to protect England's printing-press money in world exchange.

In times past the money systems of the various nations of the world were based upon gold but that has all been changed now. Gold was the common denominator of all currencies and kept the same, with some management of gold, as between themselves, with very little fluctuation. That is to say parities were maintained because of the firm foundation of gold. What is the basis of world currencies today? Government credit with parities maintained, or attempted to be maintained, by a device known as a stabilization fund. To be more specific, the principal money of the world today is the British pound, based upon government credit, with the dollar and the franc also based upon government credit, as satellites revolving around the British pound, and kept in their places by the operation of the stabilization funds of these nations. Up to now under this new device there has been little strain upon these funds, because of the policy of inflation, or let us say reflation, that has been the policy of the principal nations of the world led by Great Britain. But let us suppose that because of war, or threatened war, these stabilization funds would then be called upon to do a real job. It is not a far stretch of the imagination to figure out what might happen to us. Not because of an altruistic motive on our part but from sheer necessity of economic defense, we might not only have to support them with our gold, but support them with military force in order to protect our own economic situation. The reason for our entry in the last war was the threat to our economic situation, and that may happen again. In fact, it is more likely to happen because of great pools of government credit, our own included, which must be supported, otherwise chaos is bound to ensue.

And so it must be apparent that our stabilization fund is not a national institution but an international institution, operating as it does to support and defend the pound and the franc so that the dollar may in turn be protected in foreign exchange. Of course, the pound and the franc operate in the same way upon the dollar so that the pound and the franc may be protected. These may be said to be reciprocal operations, but at the same time they tie us into world currents that the American people have expressed themselves most emphatically that they would like to be free of.

If the American people really understood the implications, ramifications, probabilities, and possibilities of this tie in leading us into war, they would immediately and vigorously insist upon its abatement. Because of lack of understanding we are in the swirl of dangerous world currents held back by a dam that is sure to break, as every informed person believes, and when this happens we shall be carried along with the current whether we want to or not.

The question presents itself whether we can untie ourselves of these financial operations and disconnect ourselves from the swirl of these currents. My answer is unhesitating yes, and I believe very simply, too.

Let us repeal the stabilization fund law and go back to specie payments. With specie payment the dollar will take care of itself in any market of the world, and the stabilization fund with its entangling alliances will be unnecessary. But how could we go back to specie payments? By so managing gold to give it a value fair to producers and consumers, debtors and creditors, and then stabilizing it at that value. You may do this by the use of a gold value equivalent. Let us use a gold equivalent in our monetary base as its gold value, or its world gold equivalent value, in such an amount as will give us a value of gold that is consistent with our own natural interests. Then we could safely redeem either in gold or in gold value equivalent according to the tenor of the contract.

During the past three Congresses, bills have been pending here to accomplish this objective. If the principle contained in these bills had been enacted into law, the Congress would have acted in accordance within its constitutional duty, to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and obviated the necessity of the stabilization fund and our revalution of gold devices promulgated and proclaimed by the international bankers to regulate the value of money instead of the Congress of the United States; devices to protect the printing-press money of the international bankers and involve us when they get into war to come to their rescue in order to save ourselves; devices so geared in their good time to get us to settle the war debts at 10 or 15 cents on the dollar, so that they can again come into this market and float their printing-press bonds. By all means let them pay their debts, which have already been greatly scaled down; and if they do not pay let us hold the bonds and forego their measly payments, as an insurance against war, until we may by proper monetary practices escape the involvement in their intrigue which are leading the world into war and chaos as sure as the sun rises and sets in the heavens.

For what is now becoming to be a part of three administrations, we have seen emergency laws enacted. These laws cannot be claimed to go to the cause of our economic ills. They have merely alleviated the symptoms that trouble us. They leave heavy debts, burdensome taxes, and continued unemployment.

Congress has not appointed these advisers to the administration past and present. Congress has had no voice in nominating these men to draft the laws that Congress has had to vote on for nearly 6 years. These laws have been forced upon us by circumstances while we lacked the time for a proper study and consideration of our situation. Congress has acted under the duress of acute depression and the Constitution has been forgotten.

I refer now to the provision of the Constitution which is designed to protect the people from the very form of legislation which we have passed. It might be called special legislation, because these laws were drafted by specialists. They were not drafted by the constituted representatives of the people. And because some of them are popular for the time being, it does not follow that their popularity will endure.

Under our Constitution, Congress is specifically empowered for legislative work. And the three departments of government are to be kept separate and independent of each other. I believe that I voice the sentiment of the Members of this House when I say that the time is come when Congress must assume the obligations and privileges which rest with it under its oath to maintain, support, and defend the Constitution of the United States. And when we face the debt question that is a good place to start in.

Members of the House of Representatives, foreigners who are agents of foreign governments have come to the United States and are now here, or recently have been, to hold private conferences with economic advisers unknown to the Congress, who will formulate plans that will control the economic destiny of the people of this great Nation, when we all know that Congress is the only authority that has been endowed with such responsibility under our laws.

Under the plan of this Government, open meetings of committees, where questions are asked and answered, where cross-examination is possible, is the wisely conceived program for giving birth to such legislation. Have we surrendered forever the form of government our forefathers set up? Have we repudiated it by nullification? Why cannot this form of government be again assumed? What becomes of our oath of office if we do not live up to it and what better place is there to start with than to consider the problem of debts due the United States from foreign nations, with the resolve to go to the bottom of this economic problem.

We have evolved plan after plan to alleviate our economic ills; we need to take the time to cure them. We have attempted to soften the blow which falls upon us as a result of economic blunders in the past which have unloosed forces which we, as a Congress, should control, and I believe I voice the feeling of every truly patriotic citizen in this country when I say we must now devote ourselves wholeheartedly to the duties of the Congress under the Constitution in this terrible situation.

In the 6 years that have passed since the depression we have drifted far enough afield to be able to see, without the need of chart or compass, the direction in which we are going. This Nation faces disaster unless we formulate a sound economic basis. Our present prosperity is temporary; it is costing billions in increasing debts and taxes. While time yet permits we must put concrete under our foundations to hold up the weight of all this superstructive we have created in these alleviative measures.

I have analyzed for you in brief the seriousness of our situation. I submit to the House of Representatives that the time for action has arrived and that at the beginning of this Congress the House should take action. I propose that a committee of eleven be constituted by the House of Representatives to study the debt question and the economic factors relating thereto—namely, the restoration of commerce, the resoration of foreign markets, and through that means the restoration of employment.

I propose that this committee shall be charged with the study of the fundamental aspects of this problem, that it shall not any longer concern itself with alleviating the symptoms of our economic disaster, but shall devote itself to first causes and to curing the basic cause of all the trouble, and in accordance with this I will offer for your consideration a bill providing for a committee referred to above. Thanks. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sorry that I cannot agree with everything that the gentleman has said, but I did like the remarks he made at first, saying that there is a tendency to figure that we are completely over our economic difficulty. It reminds me of the remark of Dr. Coué when he came to the United States with his formula that day by day in every way we are getting better and better. He said that did not work very well in the United States, because the American people always wanted to shorten things, to cut them down, and they would not say the whole thing, but were content just to say, "Oh, hell, I'm well."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have listened with interest to the gentleman's scholarly analysis of the whole debt set-up, and I take it the gentleman's thesis is that, first of all, the American people will not permit the cancelation of the debts, and, secondly, that it would be better to forego the payment rather than to become embroiled in war. Does the gentleman feel that we can continue as a creditor nation with from $11,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000 of gold to our credit without ultimate disastrous effect upon the entire people of the world?

Mr. LAMNECK. As a matter of fact, there is not very much difference in our world commerce today with exports and imports; they are almost balanced, and I am not sure but that it will be only a short time before we are an importing nation instead of an exporting nation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman take the position that something ought to be done to collect the war debt? I think where the whole thing has fallen down is in the method of payment.

Mr. LAMNECK. I say to the gentleman that my judgment is that if there is anyone who ought to determine in this connection what the effect of cancelation of the war debt will be on America, it should be the Congress and not some foreigner from France or England or anywhere else.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to know whether the gentleman has in mind some method by which payment can be made. I believe the gentleman will agree that it cannot be paid in gold, inasmuch as we have most of the gold of the world. It cannot be paid in dollar credit, because we cannot set up dollar credit on this side, because in view of our large unemployment situation we cannot permit an unrestricted importation of goods whereby dollar credits could be set up. If those two are out of the window, what method shall we employ or shall they employ to pay us?

Mr. LAMNECK. Suppose we canceled the war debt——

Mr. DIRKSEN. But according to the gentleman's theory they could never pay it and I am interested in the gentleman's theory.

Mr. LAMNECK. I want Congress to investigate what we should do about the war debts and not somebody else.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Has the gentleman at present a definite idea of how it should be done?

Mr. LAMNECK. I do not know how it can be done, but I do not want somebody from Europe telling us how.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I did not intend to speak on this subject but if the gentleman will permit me I have something here which seems very apt and I want to read this into the RECORD:

> "We're poor and, besides", Mussolini explains,
> "We'd much rather spend on aggressive campaigns."
>
> "We haven't a pfennig", the Germans contend,
> "Except what for armies and cannon we spend."
>
> And the British of course contrive for a way
> To talk about honor but not about pay.
>
> And the French are so charming—so charming and thrifty
> They find it convenient to be a bit shifty.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, may I say, with reference to the war debt, this is my stand: Let the war debts stand as an everlasting monument to the folly of going to war. [Applause.] I do not care whether they are ever paid. We will never go across the Atlantic or the Pacific to fight other nations' battles for them.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] made the observation that he wished he could compel the membership of this House to come here for a month, I believe. I wish here to make the statement that voluntarily and without previous agreement, five of the six Members from the State of Washington have been sitting here during this discussion—Mr. SMITH, Mr. WALLGREN, Mr. LEAVY, Mr. COFFEE, and myself. Five of the six Members of the Washington delegation. I challenge any other State to make a record of that kind, except that I see the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY] present, and when he is here the whole delegation is here. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to speak this afternoon for 3 or 4 minutes about the distressing strike we have been having on the Pacific coast. It has lasted for about 100 days. Like all other strikes, there are three interested parties—the employers, the employees, and the innocent suffering public. We Members from the three States on the Pacific coast have been hearing from that third party, the innocent suffering public. So we met about 2 weeks ago and a committee of three was chosen to go and call on the Labor Department. I was made chairman of that committee. The other members of the committee were the gentlewoman from Oregon [Mrs. HONEYMAN] and the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER]. We called upon Mr. McGrady about 2 weeks ago. Later on we called upon the Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, and had a conversation with her which lasted about 1 hour. It has taken a long time to get any kind of agreement, but her special assistant has been in contact with my office.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. HILL of Washington. It has been a rather long, drawn-out affair, but I am glad to state to the House at this time that just a few minutes ago I received this telephone message from Mr. Stehlman, special assistant to the Labor Department. He said that voting by longshoremen whether they wished to continue the strike or end it was now in progress throughout the length of the coast. The vote has been on in San Francisco and San Pedro, Calif. The vote scheduled to start simultaneously in Portland, Tacoma, and Seattle was halted because of inclement weather. The results of the voting are due tomorrow night. Contact men in strategic points have reported on the attitude of the strikers, the vote signifying a return to work by Thursday is expected.

Let Michigan take note of that and go and do likewise. I think this proves three things: First, that the Labor Department is not the inefficient department that some would have it, by their criticism here. Secondly, that public opinion by its pressure very often brings contending parties together around the table, and, third, that these things can be settled amicably as they should be if both sides are willing to sit down and reason things out, intsead of fighting them out. [Applause.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I yield, if I have the time.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman, of course, refers to the maritime strike on the coast?

Mr. HILL of Washington. On the Pacific coast; yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Those strikes have occurred repeatedly in the past 3 or 4 years, have they not?

Mr. HILL of Washington. That is true.

Mr. CULKIN. And they have been very disastrous to shipping?

Mr. HILL of Washington. That is true.

Mr. CULKIN. It has been suggested that the Railroad Labor Act, which applies to the employees of railroads, and which has been very efficient in curing this strike situation, be applied to the maritime situation, creating a board whereby the men are represented, the operators are represented, and declaring as a matter of public policy that men have the right to collective bargaining and the right to be represented.

Mr. HILL of Washington. That has been suggested at our meetings, and I am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. CULKIN. Does not the gentleman think that would be desirable legislation, so that both sides would have a tribunal where they might go to adjust these differences without going into a long, distressing strike?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I certainly am in favor of it.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not a fact that it took 4 months on the Pacific coast, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars to get the striking seamen to a point where they would vote?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I would not say the seamen alone; the shipowners also. They were both at fault. I think we should look at it from both sides instead of from one side.

Mr. DONDERO. If we could do it in Michigan in the same length of time, we still have 3 months to run.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Well, see that you do it in the next 3 months.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. The General Motors Co. is the one who sat down on this thing, particularly Mr. Sloan. The General Motors have gotten out injunctions against the Labor Board to prevent them even having hearings on whether these people can have an election.

Mr. DONDERO. But is it not a fact that not a single effort has been made to bring the warring factions to a point where they are willing to take a vote in the Michigan plants?

Mr. MAVERICK. The people in Michigan, the automobile workers, large numbers of industrial workers, have been prevented from even having an election to determine who is to represent them.

The unions are willing to settle with the automobile manufacturers now. It is Mr. Sloan who is not willing.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman from Texas is entirely mistaken on that point.

Mr. HILL of Washington. That is a matter of opinion, but both sides should get together and the arbitration board should settle it.

Mr. MAVERICK. I think they should get together, of course. But the fault is the action of Mr. Sloan.

Mr. DONDERO. I think the gentleman is mistaken on that.

HANDS OF GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION NOT CLEAN

Mr. MAVERICK. Oh, no! I repeat, the General Motors has refused to even let elections be held to determine labor's representatives, or to meet the representatives of labor in order to mediate. Please get the difference of arbitrate and mediate. They have refused the aid of the Government. In other words, the General Motors Corporation will not even discuss the matter. Their hands are not clean.

GENERAL MOTORS SPIES LIKE OGPU OF RUSSIA

Who brought on this strike? For 2 or 3 years the General Motors have had labor spies, an espionage system worse than the Ogpu of Russia. They have used as spies men with criminal records, rascals, and racketeers.

They have a private army, their own tear-gas bombs, and armament. Mr. Sloan comes to Washington and he double-crosses the Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins. The General Motors treat with contempt the Federal Government, except they use the judicial branch to get out dilatory injunctions.

Like Bourbons who never learn anything, they add insult to injury and declare a dividend, when production has stopped and during the bitterest strike in American history. This is on top of two big dividends late last year. This action is taken to make the American people believe that prosperity has returned because dividends are declared, to bribe the American people, and make them believe the employees in the automobile plants are wrong.

GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION SCAR WILL NOT HEAL

Mr. Chairman, the automobile, steel, and big industrial groups may win this strike. They may, by force, beat down opposition. But they are leaving a scar that will not heal. For they are acting in face of the last election, which demanded fairness, decent working conditions, and progress. Possibly they will go on with their speed-up, make a lot of money.

But the action of Mr. Sloan and his directors is not even sensible. It will lead to disaster. In the end their action will be soundly repudiated. And if there comes violence, it will be the fault of the industrial leaders and not that of labor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I have been rather intrigued and informed by the discussions that have taken place in the Well today and yesterday on the fiscal affairs and the administrative operations of our Government. I am sure there is not a Members in this Chamber, and for that matter I am sure there is not a Member of the House of Representatives, who in going forth to seek votes and to become a Member of this body has not at some time or other given public assurance that he stands for efficiency and economy in government. It is one of those things that we do in the course of a campaign because we realize that people, after all, are interested in economy and retrenchment in the fiscal affairs of our country so that it may remain upon a solvent basis. But despite all the protestations we have made to our constituencies the Government of the United States grows and continues to grow, and I am satisfied that everybody in this Chamber has at some time or other been rather troubled by this condition, wondering what the ultimate outcome will be.

In approaching this problem we ought to bring to it a high degree of intellectual honesty, a species of courage, and a degree of discernment. I believe I could give assurances here today that I am not going back to my people any more and stand on the platform day after day and talk about economy in government, except as this remark shall be qualified because of the very nature of government and the demands that are being made upon it. The expenditures of the Government today are enormous, and there must have come to your mind the question as to whether or not we are going to be able to shrink this great, ponderous Government machine back into the pattern of 1929 when the expenditures for the regular departments probably did not exceed $3,000,000,000. Our regular expenditures in 1938 will exceed those of 1929 by about two and one-third billion. Without relief and without some of the emergency expenditures, we can say, in a general way, that today we are in the $6,000,000,000 class; and the question that is very precipitous right now is whether or not we are going to continue as a $6,000,000,000 government.

My own personal answer to the question is that I believe we are. I do not believe that there is going to be a material recession from the high levels that we have reached today. It seems to me that the former Senator from Utah, Reed Smoot, who served with distinction at the other end of the Capitol for so many years and who had an acute knowledge of the fiscal affairs of this Government, was correct in his recent conclusion that as we progressively reach these higher levels we stay there and never go back.

As one contemplates a $6,000,000,000 expenditure it is rather interesting to go back to the first appropriation bill introduced in the first Congress, in 1789. This was at that time only a simplified, skeletonized government. It must have been intriguing to be in Philadelphia 150 years ago when Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton probably could walk arm in arm under the trees and settle some of the great and weighty affairs of state.

In those days our Government consisted of a Congress of 65 Members, a parchment copy of the Constitution that had not been interpreted as yet, and the President of the United States, George Washington. Jefferson stated that when he took charge of the Department of State he had two clerks. The first appropriation bill, if I remember the figures correctly, provided $91,000 in pensions, $127,000 for the War Department, about $130,000 to take up some warrants that had been issued and were due against the Treasury of the United States—altogether an appropriation bill that probably did not exceed $600,000 or $700,000. It is a far cry from a $600,000 appropriation bill in 1789, when less than 100 people operated the Government of the United States, to the enormous appropriation bills of 1936, with 841,000 civil servants, if you please, on the Government pay roll, and a Government whose functions reach into every metropolis, hamlet, and village from one end of the country to the other. It is a rather staggering growth; and yet as one looks back over the development of this country it is not so surprising after all.

When Washington was the President of the United States we had no automobile; today we have 26,000,000 motor cars traveling from one end of the country to the other, and as a result of highway and motor-car development, all sorts of functions of government were brought into play. When Washington was President I think we had 8 towns with a population in excess of 6,000; today we have over 1,200 towns with a population in excess of 6,000, some of them in the millions bracket. There were no hard roads in 1789, but today the country is girded with surfaced highways. There were no filling stations and hot-dog stands in George Washington's day, but today they are flung over the country from coast to coast.

When Washington was the President we had no steamships to ply the oceans, and today the Queen Mary makes the ocean voyage in 62 hours. When Washington was the President there were few machine processes in the early industries of the country, and today cigarettes, newspapers, automobiles, and what not are ground out in enormous quantities by machinery that is a marvel of ingenuity. Today we even milk cows by machinery.

When Washington was the President ours was a sweet and pristine civilization, but today we have radios and telephones and movies and air conditioning and Mickey Mouse and night clubs and liquor and electricity and comic papers and what not, and somehow each and all of them repose new demands upon government.

There has been an amazing development in this country; and as we have grown from scarcely 4,000,000 population to 130,000,000, with many diverse things that occupy the minds of people and the strange enterprises we have built up in this country, it is not at all surprising that such growth should be reflected in the growth of the governmental machine.

It is a question, of course, as to whether or not we are going to be able to whittle the thing down so as to shrink it into the pattern of 1929. It is also a question as to whether we should whittle it down, as a matter of fact. I can appreciate that government grows in proportion to the demands upon government. If you are students of history, you remember that in the period immediately before the Civil War and after the Civil War we had a gradual development of paternalism in this country. Who were the ones who first articulated that paternalistic cry? I would say it was the railroad companies and the canal companies. They were the first to come to the Federal Government asking for a hand-out. So it is not surprising that when the great windrows of soldiers began to come back to their homes in the North and in the South they felt the appeal of that cry to "Get yourself a homestead."

Mr. Chairman, a homestead organization was developed in this country, probably one of the first propaganda organizations we had. Its slogan was "Vote yourself a farm." The people back home then decided they could vote for those people and put them in office who were willing to see that a homestead law went on the books. They were looking to the Nation's Capital for some kind of an opportunity. So gradually there has been a growth of that paternalistic feeling in this country, and it is not surprising at all that it is translated in terms of governmental demands which cost money.

I was rather intrigued this summer when I received a letter from the magazine Delineator. They wanted to know what attitude one would take upon the broad subject of "indefensible spending." That magazine contained a beautifully printed request which one's constituents could clip out and send, in which they exhorted their Representatives to resist all sorts of indefensible spending. Well, I got to pondering over that, and I thought "Where are you going to draw the line between defensible and indefensible spending?"

When we speak of this in terms of the whole country, it is not so easy to see it. Many people think we ought to have a lot more schools. Others believe we ought to have a lot more hospitals. Still others believe we should have more playgrounds and parks. This all costs money, and those who cling to the public purse strings say "It costs money. It will raise the tax rate. It will continue to maintain an unbalanced Budget, and we ought to stop it." But this constant, unrelenting demand for improvement in this country has made this the greatest country in the world. Therefore you have to be pretty careful where you are going to place the line that constitutes the difference between defensible and indefensible spending.

One might take any State in the Union and point to surfaced highways and tuberculosis sanitariums and hospitals and colleges and parks and swimming pools and railroad grade separations and clinics for crippled children and a host of other things which contribute to the well-being, the health, the comfort, of the people and say that those things sprang into being only because a few people began to create sentiment for such things and in a little while there came a swelling demand for them. The people then submitted to general or special taxation that such things might exist. At the time they were contemplated there were those who opposed them, no doubt, on the ground that it would raise the tax rate and that it would cost a lot of money. And so they would. And so they did. We must fully appreciate the fact that you cannot build these United States into the most glorious place in all the world except at a sacrifice, and that sacrifice is money.

Mr. Chairman, I want to get down to some of the provisions in the pending bill to show just how we have grown.

There is the Civil Service Commission, for which we appropriate in this bill two and one-third million dollars, not considering the retirement fund, with a personnel of 1,100 people to administer the law. Let us journey back to 1881, when an assassin's bullet took the life of President Garfield.

There were a few people in the country at that time agitating for civil-service reform. Senator Conklin, of New York, referred to them as "man milliners" and "carpet knights." He believed in the old spoils system. I recall from the history books that they sent a man out to lecture in the Coliseum in Chicago, and it is recorded that only three people went to this lecture on civil-service reform. But when the assassin's bullet, fired by a disappointed office seeker, took the life of a President of the United States there was a great demand for civil-service reform.

You cannot articulate civil-service reform unless you have an agency with which to do it. So you set up the Civil Service Commission. Now you cannot operate the Civil Service Commission unless you have a personnel. They have to be on the pay roll. In a little while you will find an expenditure has crept in because the people have demanded a certain reform or the extension of a certain function of Government. Therefore we have today as the reflected shadow of a movement that started in 1881 two and one-third million dollars in this bill for the administrative functions of the Civil Service Commission.

That is not hard to understand. This indicates just how the Government grows.

We have another provision in this bill involving two and a third million dollars for railroad retirement. You remember in previous Congresses the contentions made for the railroad-retirement bill. It was shuffled back and forth and finally got upon the law books of the Nation. Obviously, when you consider that it applies to 200,000 railroaders in this country who are of retirement age, you have to have a bureau; you have to have an administrative agency to administer the provisions of the bill. It takes people; it takes stationery; it takes money; it takes supplies; it takes all of those things that we interpret in terms of dollars and cents. So today we have a Railroad Retirement Board, with 672 people, and for their functions we are asked to appropriate two and one-third million dollars.

You will see that behind the law there was a public demand, and after it gets on the law books we have to translate it into terms of administrative personnel, supplies, and money. Therefore, you add it to the previous demands made upon the Government.

You who served in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses remember the great hue and cry that was made for a Securities Exchange Commission after the debacle of 1929, when so much of the value went out of these securities that flooded across the tables of the exchanges. There was a great demand for reform in this country at that time. Today we have a Securities Exchange Commission. It is taken care of in the pending bill. We have some 1,129 people down there to administer it. Is there anyone who will begrudge the three and one-third million that is being appropriated for the administration of the Securities Exchange Commission and the 1,129 people that are necessary in order to carry the will of this Congress into effect for the benefit of the people of this country?

There is another demand that found its way upon the statute books of the country and one more that has to be translated into terms of money which is reflected in the operating expenses of the Government.

We have an item in here for the Smithsonian Institution. According to the facts adduced before the committee, there was a 12-year period starting in 1846 during which time not a dollar was appropriated by the Congress for the Smithsonian Institution. It started out as an endowed institution through an endowment, not by one of our own people but by an Englishman named Smithson.

Today it represents a value of $130,000,000, but little by little it has grown. The Smithsonian has gone into radio, they have gone in for international exchanges, they have gone in for astrophysical observatories, and all that sort of thing. These things are necessary, I should say, and nobody begrudges them, but they cost money and they require additional people. So once more this is reflected in the Nation's balance sheet.

Then let us consider, for instance, the veterans. You know this is an amazing growth in our Government. Go back to 1789, when we appropriated $91,000 for veterans. How much are we appropriating now? For domiciliary and hospital care, for administrative expenses, and for pensions, about $585,000,000. We have several on the pension rolls from 1812, for whom we appropriate $840. We have a number of dependents on the pension rolls who go way back to the war of 1847, the Mexican War. I think some $30,000,000 or more is for the dependents and veterans of the Civil War. So we have accumulated 848,000 people, veterans and dependents, of all wars, going back 125 years, and this costs us today $585,000,000, and is an annual expenditure.

There is not going to be any freedom from this expenditure. General Hines came before the committee, and I think our very distinguished chairman will bear me out that he said that within the next 10 years another 10,000 beds will be required for neuropsychiatric cases. Think of that! World War veterans whose minds have failed to come back, but whose bodies have come back; war veterans in whom that slender cord of memory that holds the past to the present and the present to the future is going to be snapped within the next 10 years, and then we will have to have 10,000 additional beds.

This is a recurring expense of war, and if there is anything that ought to be an inspiration to the American people to keep this country out of war, it should be this $585,000,000, for if there is any place where the hard-headed people of this country are vulnerable, it is in the pocketbook. When love and fear and all the other emotions can no longer be appealed to, you can still appeal to them with the dollar sign. It is such a vulnerable spot. This $585,000,000 is a continuing annual expense, and this is not all for the Veterans' Administration. There are additions to this, but this serves to show how far we have come and what we have implanted in the Nation's balance sheet by way of an annual demand and an annual need that has added to the cost of government and has put this country in the $6,000,000,000 class.

I want to say a word about the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, that comes within the purview of the committee because of the provision that was put in the deficiency bill last year.

We are providing about $31,000,000 for the administrative expenses of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. They have done a big work. They have made about 1,003,000 mortgages, the average amount of which is $3,020. Of course, it was to be expected that there were going to be foreclosures. You cannot help this in the very nature of things. When you try to lift people out of their difficulties and distress through the instrumentality of an emergency Government agency, there comes a time when you are going to have the same experience that a building and loan or a bank or any other financial institution has, and that is exactly what is on the doorstep of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation today. They have authorized 62,000 foreclosures, if I recall the figures correctly, and they estimate they will authorize 100,000 more. This means a lot of foreclosures. It means also you have got to have a lot of lawyers on the pay roll. You have to check a lot of records. You are looking after the people's money, and therefore it takes a lot of people. Even though the Home Owners' Loan Corporation today is in a kind of liquidation, you still have to have somewhere around 16,000 people to administer its affairs.

You will see that this is the way we arrive at the total of 841,000 people on the civil pay rolls—16,000 here, 1,500 there, 1,100 there, and 1,200 there. It does not take very long in the normal course of things to build up a staggering personnel.

We sometimes wonder at the total amounts involved, and yet this is not so surprising.

I want to refer to one other agency in this bill, the Federal Communications Commission, which illustrates so well how these expenditures climb up and how the personnel grows.

Last year we signed a so-called convention for safety at sea with other nations, which requires the inspection of ships by the Federal Communications Commission so far as the radio apparatus is concerned. I do not believe the Congress of the United States had anything to do with it, as a matter of fact, but since we have signed that convention it means they have got to inspect these ships. They need an extra $100,000, they need an extra 11 people, and so you have just added another Government function which requires both money and personnel.

I now desire to bring out what the very distinguished chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], has said over and over when, perhaps, the Committee on Appropriations has been reproached for being too generous. Demands have been made that the committee should arbitrarily slice the appropriations 25 percent, which you cannot do. I may say the trouble does not arise in the Appropriations Committee. It arises right here on the floor of the House in the form of authorization bills for appropriations. You place a bill in the hopper that calls for $100,000 or $1,000,000 and the House passes it. This is virtually a mandate to the Appropriations Committee. The damage has been done when the money has been asked for, and I think it is a kind of disease of pecuniosity that is common to every Member of this House, including myself.

Let me recite some of the bills that have been introduced. My friend from New York [Mr. CULKIN] has introduced a bill to set up a so-called motion-picture commission. There are to be five or seven members drawing $9,000 a year. They are to supervise and censor most all the pictures that come into interstate commerce.

I got quite a kick out of reading that bill and as to what would constitute an acceptable motion picture, and what pictures would be banned. One of many restrictions recited in his bill was any motion picture in which there was a prolonged expression of passionate love. When you take the clerks, stenographers, censors, and artists that would be necessary to administer it, the salary of the five members of the commission would be as nothing, because later you would have a huge number to administer it and they would be asking for one or two million dollars to carry out this censorship.

Then there is the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEITER], who has introduced a bill to erect a huge congressional dormitory. Maybe it is all right. It is to cost $6,000,000. But ultimately it will cost probably $10,000,000, as it becomes a continuing expense on the Government of the United States. I also direct your attention to the demand for a $3,000,000 auditorium, all due to the blizzard on Inauguration Day.

Our good friend, Mr. CELLER, of New York, wants a national radio, a radio station built in Washington, to cost $750,000. If it stopped there perhaps it would not be so bad. But you would have to have a director for that radio station and an assistant director and all the clerks and stenographers and others to administer it on the part of the United States.

It is interesting to consider these proposals, because it throws much light on the growth and evolution of governmental agencies. We might have a censor of cosmetics for the glamorous and glorious ladies of this country. I was thinking of it the other day in the light of all the functions undertaken by the Federal Government and often wondered how it had ever been overlooked.

But I thought some day that I would introduce a bill myself, just to see how this works, to set up a chief cosmetologist for the Federal Government. He would become then the Federal cosmetologist or cosmetician, and he would have to have an assistant. Then he would have to have two or three others in an administrative capacity and some clerks and some stenographers. Then here is the way it would work: He would at once ask for an appropriation of $200,000 for the purpose of investigating the question of why we do not have more "schoolgirl complexions" and "skins you love to touch." That would be his particular function as a bureau head, and then in a little while he would ask for two or three hundred thousand dollars more to send scientists to the old country to engage in research. They would go into the dusty byways of the Nile and try to find out all the creams and lotions and astringents that made Cleopatra such a wondrous, historic beauty. Naturally they would want to make long and sustained inquiry into the secrets by which the Queen of Sheba became such a charmer. They would want to know whether it was a peachblow complexion by which Heloise wove her spell over Abelard. And having dug all the beauty secrets from the files of the ancient Alexandrian library and from other sources, they would return to give us the benefit of their researches by issuing pamphlets and statements and circulars on the arts of beauty culture and cosmetics.

In a little while these scientists would come back and a lot of monographs would go through the Government Printing Office, and the chief cosmetologist would go on the radio and pretty soon we would hear that the lowly pimple is a national menace, and there would be a crusade against the blackhead, which is also a menace to civilization. Surely, the Bureau would reach the place where grants-in-aid would be provided to different States to aid in promoting complexions that had a certain Federal standard of allure.

That is the way Government bureaus grow, once they get a start, and it is a rather intriguing thing, and we help it every day. I do not see my good friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] on the floor, but I call attention to a bill which he introduced. You know we have some rather historic naval vessels, with lots of tradition behind them. He wants to bring them here to Washington and anchor them in the Potomac River, and there they would become museums, and all the school children of the country could come here and look in and around them and visitors would come and drink to their heart's content of the traditions and lore that surround these cruisers of the sea. The bill does not carry any appropriation. Oh, no; it is just an authorization bill. The appropriation will come later. If and when we get those vessels up here they will have to be fixed up; you would have to put up some guardrails and a lot of painting will have to be done on the inside and the outside and you will have to decorate them with pictures and you will have to make them presentable and palatable to the taste of the American people, and in a little while you will have guides and guards and attendants galore, who will be necessary to take the visitors over these ships and show them all about the Olympia and the America and all of the others that we have anchored down here in the Potomac, and then we would have set up another agency and we would have added to the personnel and to the administrative expenses of the Government.

It is an amazing thing, and I have often wondered over a proper philosophy of approach to that problem. Can you conscientiously go out and say to your people in Missouri or Michigan or Massachusetts or anywhere else that you believe in economy, that you believe in retrenchment, when, as a matter of fact, you may come here and suddenly find yourselves voting for a bill that calls for increased expenditures and for more people on the pay roll? There ought to be some other approach to it, and I think I found the approach when I served in the capacity of humble commissioner of finance in my home town in Illinois. I used to sit around the house on Sundays and Saturdays, digging around in books, and wondering why expenditures always seemed to exceed revenues and where it would stop, because cities and counties and States have exactly the same experience as the Federal Government in that they grow, and their money requirements and their personnel grow. At that time I came upon this rather happy incident. I noticed the difference between the death rate in Minneapolis and in Kansas City. I discovered suddenly that they spent twice as much per capita for health in Minneapolis as in Kansas City. I thought, "There is the formula." Let us not be too much concerned about questions of amount, although you have to keep them in mind, but let us give emphasis, more emphasis, and more emphasis to the question of what we get for our money. The fact that the per-capita expense for health in one city is twice that of another city of comparable size is not nearly so important as the fact that the number of people who die is one-half that of the city with the low per-capita cost. In other words, it is a question of value. It is not always the fact that we are a $6,000,000,000 Government that makes so much difference. It is the question of whether we get $6,000,000,000 worth of value for the people of the country in return for the expenditure that is made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

It seems to me that more and more we can place emphasis upon that matter of getting our money's worth and at the same time have proper regard for the aggregate size of the expenditure.

It comes back to a statement that Gladstone once made to some statesman in England, who said, "In Heaven's name, Mr. Premier, why don't you let England live like a gentleman?" Gladstone looked at him quizzically and said, "Because it costs five times more than it ought to to let the country live like a gentleman."

What he meant was that if you are going to raise the country to the gentlemanly stage and you have to do it through ponderous governmental machinery, it was going to cost more than it should. I think that is true. I hope the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. WOODRUM] talks a little more on the bill this afternoon to say something about an idea he had in mind about setting up some kind of an agency as an arm of the Congress, so that we can find out just what the people are going to get for their money.

These people from time to time come before the committee. We ask them questions and they answer the questions very freely but that is about as far as it goes. We do not know overly much about what is going on down at the other end of the Avenue. We do not know a great deal about the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Housing Administration, or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. For the most part, we take their word for it. I thoroughly agree in the sort of informal proposition which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has in mind, namely, some adjunct of the Congress so that we can send experienced auditors and investigators down there and see precisely what we are getting for our money. Until that is done, let no one hope there is going to be any great recession from this $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000 level we have reached; because these bureaus and commissions become entrenched, and they will continue, and we have no way of evaluating the necessity for their functions, and until we do, we will be in something of a difficulty.

It seems to me, then, that as a thesis for these informal remarks which I have made this afternoon, both sides of the aisle can give a little more thought and emphasis to the question of getting our money's worth while we are also thinking of the aggregate amount of money that is being spent.

With that in mind I am going to utter one little defense for politicians. I suppose in a personal way we all own to the fact that we are politicians. We are subject to the slings and arrows of outrageous fortunes, as Shakespeare used to say. When they cannot think of any other protest, it is always easy to stoop down and get half a brick and throw it at the gentry known as politicians. I want to utter a little defense for them right now, because I believe it is the politician as a class who has lifted this country up, who has harmonized its adverse factions and sought to satisfy all sides. If it had not been for the politician to throw the oil of harmony here and there, you would have two bickering sides to almost every controversy, both of whom would insist they were right, both of whom would not budge 1 inch, with the result that the growth of this country would have been steadily retarded. I think we have served a very useful purpose in somehow ironing out those controversies, bestowing a little here and bestowing a little there, and gradually bringing progress to the country. We can continue to do that. Let us refine our desires and be a little more discerning when it comes to this matter of expenditure. Let us put the emphasis upon the value received as much as upon the aggregate expenditure, and I think it will be rather healthy for the country as a whole. [Applause.]

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mrs. O'DAY. Does the gentleman agree with me that one step in the direction which he has indicated would be the speedy passage of the pure food and drug bill, and thus obviate the necessity for a national cosmetician? [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say to the lady from New York that I have been heartily in favor of the pure food, drug, and costmetics bill.

Mrs. O'DAY. I am getting many letters asking for its speedy passage.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I was only indulging in a little levity this afternoon for the purpose of showing how, in my judgment, bureaucracy grows, and how necessary it is for us to constantly examine these functions to find out whether they are necessary.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Does that bill which the gentleman favors require another agency?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman mean the cosmetician?

Mr. MICHENER. No, no. I mean the pure food and drug bill. Does that require another one of those boards?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No. It will be administered partly in the Federal Trade Commission and partly in the Department of Agriculture, where they are already administering such laws as are already on the books with reference to pure foods and drugs. They may have to employ other personnel a little, but I do not know.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I ask the gentleman without embarrassing him which pure food and drug bill he is for?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that if he has introduced one I am for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have not introduced one, but I am a member of the committee that is to consider one.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will be over to the gentleman's office this evening. [Laughter.]

It would appear that my remedy for bureaucracy is more bureaus. The answer is that bureaus spring from public demand for an extension of the functions of government and that our duty is to keep them within bounds. It would appear that the people of this Nation are pretty much reconciled to the agencies of government and that our hope is to keep the number down and give more attention to securing efficient administration from those we have. On that basis another agency, strictly under the control of Congress, to investigate existing agencies and ascertain where there is waste and inefficiency and duplication and overlapping would actually result in a great saving to the people. When an agency of the Government comes before the Appropriations Committee with its justification for administrative expenditures and informs the committee what it has to do, how many people it needs to carry on its functions, there is little else for the committee to do except to accept that justification, because we now have no means or method by which we can learn where economies might be effected and efficiency promoted. I venture the opinion that such a legislative bureau would save 20 times its cost every year.

If perchance the commerce clause of the Constitution should be expanded in its purport, either by constitutional amendment or otherwise, to embrace the broad subject of wages and hours, the number of agencies of Government and the personnel to administer them will be greatly expanded. If health insurance becomes a part of the security program of the Nation, there will be an increase in personnel and functions. If crop insurance or a farm tenancy program is written into the law, it means more people and more Federal agencies. The number of people working for the Federal Government and the number of agencies will in the last analysis be determined in this democracy not by the Congress but by the people, and hence the task of securing maximum efficiency and minimum expense assume even larger proportions. Not only what we spend in the aggregate for the operations of government but what we get for the expenditure should be kept constantly in mind.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, we shall start reading this bill, I understand, tomorrow. I intend to offer a few amendments. They are very simple. Every place where the phrase "labor-saving devices" appears I am going to move to strike it out.

The United States Government has been telling the industries of the Nation that they should not use labor-saving devices, thereby throwing thousands of people out of employment, yet in this bill we provide in six or seven different places for the use of labor-saving devices by these different independent agencies of the Government.

When I realize that the Government's use of these labor-saving devices will benefit primarily concerns like the Remington-Rand Corporation, the great enemy of organized labor, the manufacturing establishment, one of whose owners, Mr. Rand, ran a school for strikebreakers on a train running from New York to Hartford, telling the strikebreakers how they were to handle the pickets when they reached the Remington-Rand plant and offering $5 for every man who would break through the picket line, I do not think the Government should go very far toward helping such an organization. I would start by striking from the independent offices appropriation bill labor-saving devices as a protest against a company which is against decent working conditions, an organization which refuses to bargain collectively with its workers. They are going to benefit tremendously, as they have benefited in the past, through sale of labor-saving devices.

So wherever the phrase "labor-saving devices" appears in the bill I am going to move to strike it out for two reasons: One, that we may stop giving millions of dollars of Government money to an organization that is trying to strangle labor; and, two, that the United States Government may set an example for industry in this country, the example of keeping people at work instead of throwing them out of work.

Only a few minutes ago I was informed by a newspaperman that the United States Civil Service Commission is just getting ready to fire 130 employees because they have a new electric eye which is going to read papers. While we are not against invention, while we are not against anything which is going to save time, still, if this is followed to its logical conclusion it has terrible possibilities. Suppose, for instance, there were a machine that would make all the cigars in the Nation, a machine to make all the hats in the Nation, and so on and so forth, where, under such conditions, would there be purchasers to buy these products, with no human workers obtaining wages to buy?

Now, this sounds far-fetched, but if you inquire in industry you will find one big machine that throws not 10 people out of employment, not 20 people out of employment, but 50 and 100 at a time. The Social Security Act, through its unemployment insurance feature, is supposed to take care of such situations, but I do not believe that the United States Government should tell industry not to throw people out of work, not to install labor-saving devices without the Government itself setting the example.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Referring to the gentleman's statement about the Civil Service Commission, I will relieve the gentleman's mind on that by telling him that we are giving the Civil Service Commission more money and more personnel this year.

Mr. CONNERY. But I understand they are going to fire 130 of their employees.

Mr. WOODRUM. I fail to see why they should reduce their personnel when in this bill we are providing them more money and more personnel than they had last year.

Mr. CONNERY. I come now to my next amendment, and I hope it will not be stricken out on a point of order because it is of tremendous importance, I think, to the Government workers and also to the people. My amendment relates to page 56 of the bill, and if my amendment is adopted that portion of the bill will read as follows:

SEC. 4. None of the funds herein appropriated for any executive department or other executive agency shall be available to pay any compensation for any pay period to the heads of those executive departments or other executive agencies who for any part of such period require or permit any officer or employee of such department or agency to work more than 39 hours per week without compensation at the rate of time and a half for time in excess of such 39 hours per week unless such work in excess of 39 hours per week without compensation at such rate is specifically required by Congress, or any compensation—

And so forth, continuing the language now in the bill.

That is very plain. You read in the paper last night that in 6 months the Government workers put in overtime to the extent of 14,000,000 hours without any extra pay from the United States Government. This Government is saying to industry: "You should go on shorter hours. You should increase the pay of your workers in order that the people of the United States may have a buying power to buy the products of manufacturers and the products of the farm." Yet the Government is working its own employees 14,000,000 hours overtime with no pay for a period of 6 months. The number of hours indicated above would take us back 600 years, long before the dawn of the American Republic and away back into history.

Mr. Chairman, we Members of Congress work long hours, but we do not have to work long hours unless we want to. However, down in a Government department they inform a clerk nicely and gently: "Well, you do not have to stay until 10 o'clock tonight working like a dog unless you want to, but if you do not stay until 10 o'clock tonight you will not fit as well in this organization as before it was suggested to you that it might be nice to stay until 10 o'clock tonight."

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I gladly yield to my colleague from Massachusetts, who is the author of the 5-day, 6-hour bill for Government workers, and I congratulate him heartily on his efforts in that direction.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman. It is pleasing coming from the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. I believe it is wrong to work employees overtime without extra compensation.

Mr. CONNERY. Absolutely.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is a very poor example for the Government to set, when we are trying to meet the problems of our day. The Government sets an example and at the same time tries to convince private industry they should not work employees overtime without compensation; when we expect private employment to compensate their employees for extra hours, and particularly to compensate them more than the regular pay.

Mr. CONNERY. Even the worst of the corporations, those that will not bargain collectively with their workers, that think the workers are in the class of slaves, pay their workers time and a half when they work overtime, because no one but a slave works overtime for nothing. The Government of the United States should be the last in the world to ask its employees to work overtime and, as the gentleman from Massachusetts stated, should set an example to the Nation. We say to industry, "We do not want you to work your employees overtime without pay"; yet that is just what the Government does. I hope the bill of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] will be reported soon, which puts the Government workers on a 5-day week, 6-hour day.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman agree with me that all wage dollars and tax dollars must come from production?

Mr. CONNERY. I would not say they must come absolutely from production. I think in general the theory is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let us proceed to the gentleman's thought with reference to the machine. Assuming that all of this activity now performed by human hands does eventually gravitate to a machine, the machine turns out the production, and that production is converted into dollars?

Mr. CONNERY. How? Who is going to buy it?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Who buys the production that is turned out now?

Mr. CONNERY. If it is to be all turned out by machines, who will have any money with which to buy anything?

Mr. CRAWFORD. All the people who have money to spend.

Mr. CONNERY. Where do they get the money?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Through their efforts.

Mr. CONNERY. What efforts?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Through the production of foodstuffs and other material.

Mr. CONNERY. Then only the farmers would be able to buy. Is that the premise of the gentleman? I am trying to follow him right along.

Mr. CRAWFORD. From manufactured goods and services.

Mr. CONNERY. There will be no money from manufactured goods in wages because nobody will be working, the machines will do the producing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman asked me who got the dollars at the present time and I am telling him. Let us assume that the machine does the work. Now, why not tax the production which the iron machine turns out just as you tax the production which the human machine turns out? It is all converted into dollars.

Mr. CONNERY. To use a slang expression, the gentleman is talking right down my alley, because I intend to offer a bill to tax the power used by these machines, using that money for unemployment insurance.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman and I agree that the money should come from a power tax rather than through a tax on the machine itself.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is immaterial.

Mr. CONNERY. May I ask the gentleman this: Where are the people going to get the money to buy hats, shoes, or anything else if the machines make it all?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Suppose we convert the production of the machines into dollars, as we do at the present time.

Mr. CONNERY. You cannot, because there is no one to buy the production of the machines. There is just one man running the factory.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, we may hire ladies to come in and pack the goods. We may hire somebody to go and find girls on the streets and in the homes who desire beautiful gowns and shoes to take the production of the machines. That is what we are doing at the present time.

Mr. CONNERY. You would only have the goods. You would have no money. With no workers obtaining wages, you would have to take money out of the air to give it to people to buy something that a machine is producing. I do not follow the gentleman economically. The Committee on Labor has been through all this for 14 years, and we have come to the conclusion that the answer is shorter hours, increased wages, and taxing the power that goes into these labor-saving devices to employ those who are thrown out of work by these labor-saving devices.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman expect to increase production that way?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; you can put on five shifts per week if you want to, and five men will have work where one man was working before, and these four extra workers will have a buying power which they did not have before. Multiply these four by a few million workers in all industry and you will have a tremendous new buying power to purchase the products of farm and industry.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. PUBLIC WORKS PLANNING—NATIONAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

During the depression we have substantially increased the facilities and developed the resources of our country for the common welfare through public works and work relief programs. We have been compelled to undertake actual work somewhat hurriedly in the emergency. Now it is time to develop a long-range plan and policy for construction, to provide the best use of our resources, and to prepare in advance against any other emergency.

In a previous message I have suggested a permanent planning agency under the Chief Executive in order that, among other things, all public works proposals may filter from the many individual departments and bureaus to a central planning place and thence to the President.

I have also suggested to the Congress that following this course of planning the President will annually submit to the Congress a list of projects which have been studied and approved and, at the same time, inform the Congress, through the Budget, of the total amount of Federal funds which, in his judgment, should be appropriated for public works during the following fiscal year.

The list of public works submitted by the President in the Budget message would, of course, be wholly advisory for it is within the discretion of the Congress to eliminate projects from this list, to alter the scope of projects, or to add other projects.

The report of the National Resources Committee on public works planning which I submit today should, of course, be read in conjunction with the recommendations for highways, bridges, dams, flood control, and so forth, already under construction, estimates for which have been submitted in the Budget, and also should be read in conjunction with other special reports, such as the report of the Great Plains Committee which I expect to submit to the Congress in a few days.

The National Resources Committee submits a 6-year program based on selection and priority of public works. The period of 6 years is arbitrarily chosen and can, of course, be made to fit into annual future appropriations made by the Congress.

The report also contains recommendations on the timing of public works and division of costs in their relation to the necessary organization of future continued planning. I have already referred to this in my message relating to the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government.

As an example of the kind of reservoir of projects constituting the 6-year program, a drainage-basin study is included in the report. This summary list of projects involving the uses of water is not to be regarded as fixed or final, as the report itself notes, but rather indicates a great forward step in the development of the planning process, considering not one project alone but the relationships between a great group of projects dealing with water use and control.

Through the formulation and annual revision of a program of all types of construction, revision, and adoption of the program by Congress and appropriations under regular budgetary procedure timed in part in relation to economic needs we can provide for the orderly development of our resources and the provision of needed facilities for our people.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the Monroe County Chapter of the New York State Society of Professional Engineers, Rochester, N. Y., favoring the creation of a Federal Department of Public Works, and so forth, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

MONROE COUNTY CHAPTER OF THE NEW YORK STATE SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL ENGINEERS,
Rochester, N. Y., January 27, 1937.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the annual meeting of this chapter on January 25 the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the Monroe County Chapter of the New York State Society of Professional Engineers approves in principle the recommendations of the President of the United States for the creation of a Federal Department of Public Works as outlined in his message to the Congress on January 12, 1937; be it further

"Resolved, That since grants of Federal aid to non-Federal public-works projects under the Federal Public Works Administration have proved to be of substantial value in reviving and maintaining employment in the engineering profession and in industries dependent upon construction activities, it should not be discontinued but absorbed within the proposed Federal Department of Public Works, so as, first, to provide for a proper and logical transition from emergency conditions to the period when local governments are financially able to resume the full load of public-works construction for immediate requirements and, second, to provide for long-range planning and development of projects to take care of future emergency conditions in the engineering profession and construction industries; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the Monroe County chapter transmit a copy of this resolution to the New York State Society of Professional Engineers, to the United States Senators from the State of New York, and to the Congressmen from the county of Monroe."

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN HURLBUT, Secretary.

The letter presented by Mr. WALSH in relation to the matter is as follows:

THE PHYSICS LABORATORIES,
HARVARD UNIVERSITY,
Cambridge, Mass., February 3, 1937.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Cruft Laboratory of the department of physics at Harvard University maintains a research radio station for the purpose of investigating the physics of the upper atmosphere. The results of this investigation are important not only to the interests of pure science but also to the development of the art of communication engineering. This radio station is completely automatic in its operation and is not engaged in point to point communication of any kind.

The station operated successfully until June 1934, when it was shut down by order of the Federal Communications Commission because the university did not maintain a continuous operator watch as required by section 318 of the Communications Act of 1934, a copy of which is attached hereto. Such a continuous operator watch would entail a cost of approximately $6,000 per annum, which the university cannot afford, especially as there is no work for such operators to do. Since June 1934 the experimental aspects of our ionosphere research program have been completely interrupted.

The Federal Communications Commission and various signal officers of the United States Army and Navy have expressed themselves as deeply regretting this situation, because the results of our research are of such great value to these governmental agencies. However, the Federal Communications Commission can render no assistance until section 318 of the Communications Act is amended by the Congress.

To this end the Commission have suggested an amendment to section 318 which has already been introduced in the House of Representatives as bill no. H. R. 3898, copy of which is attached hereto.

The staff of Cruft Laboratory respectfully requests your assistance in the passage of this bill by the Senate in order that our research program may be resumed as soon as possible.

Respectfully yours,

HOWARD AIKEN,
Instructor of Physics and Communication Engineering.

P. S.—The present law is as follows:

"OPERATION OF TRANSMITTING APPARATUS

"SEC. 318. The actual operation of all transmitting apparatus in any radio station for which a station license is required by this act shall be carried on only by a person holding an operator's license issued hereunder. No person shall operate any such apparatus in such station except under and in accordance with an operator's license issued to him by the Commission."

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on January 28 the House of Representatives passed House bill 1531, dealing with the appointment of postmasters under the civil-service law. There was introduced in the Senate a bill (S. 49) to extend the classified civil service to postmasterships of the first, second, and third classes, and for other purposes, dealing with the same subject, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The bill passed by the House has been referred to the Civil Service Committee. I ask that Senate bill 49 be withdrawn from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ARMY DAY

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That April 6 of each year be recognized by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America as Army Day, and that the President of the United States be requested, as Commander in Chief, to order military units throughout the United States to assist civic bodies in appropriate celebration to such extent as he may deem advisable; to issue a proclamation each year declaring April 6 as Army Day, and in such proclamations to invite the Governors of the various States to issue Army Day proclamations: Provided, That in the event April 6 falls on Sunday the following Monday shall be recognized as Army Day.

J. C. RUARK—WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

On motion by Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, it was Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill (S. 130) granting a pension to J. C. Ruark (73d Cong.) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate three resolutions adopted by three important agricultural groups within the last 2 weeks with respect to the reciprocal-trade agreements. One is the resolution of the National Grange, adopted at the annual convention in Columbus, Ohio, on November 11, 1936, to this effect:

> If the Reciprocal Tariff Act is to be renewed, there should be a provision requiring that all trade agreements or treaties made thereunder be ratified by the United States Senate before becoming effective. Such treaties should not contain the unconditional most-favored-nation clause, under which policy we gain concessions from one nation while making concessions to all nations producing and exporting any given commodity.

Another resolution was adopted by the Kansas State Board of Agriculture at its annual meeting in Topeka on January 15, 1937, to this effect:

> We believe the act authorizing reciprocal trade treaties should be amended to require ratification by the United States Senate, and also recommend the elimination of the most-favored-nation clause. Countries enjoying wide outlets in the American market of commodities on the free list should be required to take in exchange commodities produced in the United States which they need.

Resolutions were adopted at the fortieth annual convention of the American National Livestock Association, held on January 12 of this year at El Paso, Tex., at which nearly a thousand stockmen from 17 Western States were present. The resolutions read as follows:

> Whereas the reduction in the tariff on cattle in the Canadian reciprocal trade agreement and the extension of the same reduction to imports from Mexico has been one of the major factors in causing a sharp decline in cattle prices, as a careful examination of official Government market reports clearly indicates; and
>
> Whereas the tariff on agricultural products has been reduced to increase the export of industrial products; and
>
> Whereas these imports have been received in such manner as to effect a decline out of all proportion to the actual numbers involved: Therefore be it
>
> Resolved, That we urge that the Reciprocal Trade Act be repealed, or that all treaties negotiated under it be subject to ratification by a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate; and be it further
> Resolved, That we request that, until the act is repealed or the Canadian agreement is nullified or expires, the imports of cattle under this agreement should be placed on a weekly or monthly quota for 1937, in order to prevent dumping of large numbers on our markets in a short period, as was done in the spring of 1936.

Mr. President, I feel that the principle of equality of treatment toward foreign countries is not only desirable but also is essential to the maintenance of a sound foreign-trade policy. With the objectives of the trade-agreement program of the administration, as enunciated by Secretary of State Hull, namely, the increase of American and world commerce and the freeing of world trade from discriminatory barriers, I am in full sympathy.

The changes I am proposing, in my judgment and in the judgment of many others who desire to offer only constructive criticism, would perfect the administration of a policy with whose fundamental objectives I certainly would not quarrel.

I feel that the act as it has been administered to date has enabled countries which continue to discriminate against American commerce, and with which we have not made the trade agreements, to obtain the benefits of the concessions we have made in 14 trade agreements, without these nations outside the 14 making reciprocal concessions to our products. If I am wrong in this belief, I should be glad to be set right.

In short, Mr. President, the foregoing is the reason why I believe the act should be so amended as to withhold from most-favored-nation treatment the commerce of those countries which continue to discriminate against American commerce or which in fact do discriminate against American commerce.

Mr. President, I am offering today two proposed amendments to the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act of 1934.

One of these would restrict the provisions of such agreements dealing with imports into the United States to apply "only to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the foreign country with which the agreement is entered into."

The other amendment would require ratification of the Senate of the United States, by two-thirds vote, before the agreement could become effective.

I believe the purposes of the two amendments are perfectly clear. It is to limit the President and the State Department to the making of bilateral agreements and place such agreements in the same status as treaties, requiring Senate ratification before they become effective.

These amendments are proposed for the purpose of strengthening the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, not for the purpose of weakening it. I desire at this time to express my hearty sympathy with and complete approval of the doctrine of reciprocity. I would make the doctrine of reciprocity effective by requiring reciprocal agreements only. The United States, under my proposal, would make certain concessions to some other nation in the way of import restrictions; that nation would reciprocate by making us certain concessions.

I also am of the opinion that as the act now stands it grants too much legislative power to the Chief Executive. It is, in fact, a delegation to the President of the treaty-ratification powers reserved to the Senate by the Constitution. Under this act the Executive negotiates the treaty, called a "trade agreement", signs the treaty, called a "trade agreement", and then puts it into effect, just as if the Senate had ratified it by a two-thirds vote.

If it is desired by an amendment to the Constitution to give the President full power to make treaties, without requiring Senate ratification, that is one thing. But to give the President this power, which the Constitution places in the Senate, by act of Congress instead of by amending the Constitution is another thing. I am aware that there are court decisions which are asserted to declare that trade agreements are outside the category of treaties. Even so, I believe it would be better to adhere to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and to return to the Senate the constitutional powers of the Senate, before extending the Trade Agreements Act another 3 years, or any other length of time.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 3587) making appropriations to supply deficiences in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and the Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. My attention has been called to a statement by Mr. Hopkins which has a bearing on the W. P. A. situation. With the consent of the Senator from North Carolina, I should like to read it into the RECORD because it is illuminating, and expresses Mr. Hopkins' viewpoint more clearly, perhaps, than I was able to express it, or other Senators were able to bring it to the attention of the Senate. This was part of his testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee. The statement is as follows:

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should like first to present this general statement:

With a deficiency appropriation of $790,000,000, it is contemplated that $655,000,000 would be made available for the Works Progress Administration, including the National Youth Administration. With this amount it would be possible to employ 2,200,000 workers on Works Progress Administration projects in February, 2,150,000 in March, 2,000,000 in April, 1,800,000 in May, and 1,600,000 in June. In terms of dollars, the monthly obligations are estimated as follows: February, $151,700,000; March, $146,000,000; April, $134,500,000; May, $120,000,000; and June, $103,000,000.

The employment schedule, involving a reduction of 600,000 workers between February and June, anticipates a large and widespread increase in private employment over the period. Normally, there is a seasonal increase of about 800,000 in private jobs during these 5 months; but an increase of from 1,200,000 to 1,500,000 private jobs will probably be necessary to remove 600,000 persons from the W. P. A.

Viewing the situation from another angle, our studies of the seasonal variation in relief show that the number usually declines about 15 percent from February to June. This would mean that starting with 2,200,000 Works Progress Administration workers in February, we should ordinarily expect a decline of about 340,000 workers, leaving 1,860,000 on Works Progress Administration projects during June. To reduce Works Progress Administration employment to 1,600,000 workers, therefore, it will be necessary for 260,000 Works Progress Administration workers to find jobs over and above usual seasonal expectations.

These estimates are based on studies of our past experience during periods of reemployment, which indicate that the creation of two to two and one-half new jobs in private industry results in the removal of one family head from relief or from the W. P. A. On this basis, private employment will have to increase to the extent of 500,000 to 650,000 more than seasonal expectations if Works Progress Administration employment is to be reduced to 1,600,000 in June.

* * * * * * *

The whole Government program, as well as the W. P. A., has dropped. I should like to point out that at the present time W. P. A. employment has already declined by almost 900,000 from the maximum reached in February 1936. I should also like to call attention to the fact that between 300,000 and 500,000 employable workers have been receiving direct relief from State and local agencies outside the Works Program. These employable workers are also in the market for the new jobs created by the expansion of business or for W. P. A. jobs.

It is obvious that we could not foresee the recurrence of flood or drought disasters when these forecasts were made. For example, we now have thousands of workers engaged in rescue and relief work in the flood areas, but I do not believe we can accurately predict at this time the total increase in our costs which our relief and reconstruction activities in the afflicted areas will involve. The predictions we have made here are based on our experience in the past, and on the assumption of a sustained trend of rapid reemployment. Emergencies which arise as a result of floods, storms, drought, or any other factor which affects the need of workers, will, of course, change the picture.

Another important consideration in forecasting our costs is that we are requiring sponsors of Works Progress Administration projects to provide a larger share of project costs than they have in the past, in order to obtain the most effective use of our funds in terms of the amount of employment provided.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I have requested the Senator from North Carolina to yield to me for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of an amendment which is made necessary by reason of the action of the Senate just before it recessed yesterday. By the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] the proviso on page 2, lines 16, 17, and 18, having to do with the limitation of $3,600 for personal or professional services was eliminated from the bill.

The disbursing officer of the Senate has on hand at this time approximately $40,000 to which the limitation applies. The amount of money carried by the bill would have no such limitation applicable to it. The elimination of that provision makes it very difficult for the disbursing officer to disburse the funds now on hand. I desire, therefore, to offer an amendment removing the limitation on the funds now in the hands of the disbursing officer of the Senate. I ask that the vote by which the committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote agreeing to the amendment of the committee, as amended, is reconsidered. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of the committee amendment, the following proviso:

Provided, further, That any money heretofore appropriated and now unexpended for inquiries and investigations of the Senate shall not be subject to the limitation of $3,600 per annum for personal or professional services.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the terms of my amendment. At the proper place in the bill I propose to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the sum of money hereby appropriated or authorized to be appropriated shall be allocated, paid, or expended for any State, city, or county project or a project of any other governmental subdivision or agency unless and until such State, city, county, governmental subdivision, or agency shall have filed with the President of the United States a certificate of necessity, showing that such State, city, county, governmental subdivision, or agency has exhausted its resources to provide for the employment of its unemployed; such showing to set out the tax rate, the income, the indebtedness, the budget of such State, county, city, governmental subdivision, or agency, and the number of unemployed therein; and thereupon a finding by such authority as the President shall designate that such State, county, city, governmental subdivision, or agency is in actual need of the aid of the Federal Government to provide for its unemployed.

Mr. President, I submit that the terms of the amendment are thoroughly reasonable. They do not deprive any unemployed man or woman of his or her opportunity to be employed. They do not deprive any State, county, city, or municipal or political subdivision of Federal aid. The amendment operates only to place upon the local authority—that is, the State or the county or the city or the political subdivision—the responsibility to do what it is found to be able to do. I think no one will contend that that is an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I interrupt the Senator with no controversial idea in my mind. I think his statement is a very reasonable one, but I am somewhat worried. I am not sure that my worry is well founded, and that is the reason why I am propounding this question to the Senator.

His amendment reads, in part:

No part of the sum of money hereby appropriated or authorized to be appropriated for relief shall be allocated, paid, or expended.

Suppose a project were an irrigation project. It might extend through parts of several different counties, chiefly in the country. Before the water could be used, perhaps it would have to flow through a part of a county that would have no use whatever for the water; but it would be necessary to go far enough upstream to divert the water in order to irrigate lands in a different county. What would the Senator say about such a project?

Mr. BAILEY. I should think that under the amendment as it is written the finding authority provided for in the amendment would simply have to ascertain the financial competence of the counties involved. The amendment is written, probably, in the singular, but a fair interpretation would apply it to the plural; and if there were a project, say, for four counties, the amendment would apply accordingly.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me now call the attention of the Senator to a case that I happen to know about, where the project involves the irrigation of certain lands in a certain county.

The county where the dam is built, as far as I can see, will get no benefits whatever from it. Most of the land through which the diverting canal will have to be constructed is likewise in the county which will not have any of its land irrigated, but in that particular case the real benefit goes to the farmers in a third county. There would not be any way of getting water down there, if a project of that kind were contemplated, except through the use of the land in the county where the dam was located and where the canal would be chiefly built—a county which would get no benefit whatever from the project.

Mr. BAILEY. I think I can clear the Senator's mind on that question. Such a project as he describes would not be a county or State or municipal project. The amendment relates to projects put forward by the several political subdivisions mentioned in the amendment. The project of which the Senator speaks would be a Federal project and would not come within the terms of the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. When I looked at the wording of the amendment I was not sure that it would apply to such a case as I have mentioned. I am not yet sure, but the amendment says "authorized to be appropriated for relief."

Mr. BAILEY. That is descriptive of the sum appropriated. It is not descriptive of the money going to the project. That is the whole sum appropriated in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. But it would require that showing, that investigation to be made.

Mr. BAILEY. Not if it were a project espoused and put forward by the Federal Government. The distinction here is the difference between a Federal project and a local or a State project. My amendment relates wholly to the projects put forward by States, counties, cities, and other political subdivisions. It has no relevancy whatever to a distinctively Federal project.

Mr. NORRIS. "Other governmental subdivision", I think, would cover that kind of a project.

Mr. BAILEY. That would mean other than the United States. I do not think my amendment would be subject to that construction at all. "Other governmental subdivision" necessarily must mean subdivisions of that class; but, if the Senator wishes, I should readily accept an amendment saying "exclusive of Federal projects." We should have no trouble on that score.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator desires to go ahead with his amendment without being interrupted, I shall wait until later, but I desire to call his attention to this provision:

> A certificate of necessity, showing that such State, city, county, governmental subdivision, or agency has exhausted its resources to provide for the employment of its unemployed.

Has the Senator in mind a concise definition of what he means by having "exhausted its resources"? If so, I should like to know just what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I have a perfectly definite conception of it—that the State, city, county, governmental subdivision, or agency has done all it can do—all it should do.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask the Senator another question. A county, we will say, may levy a tax of 50 cents on $100, the constitutional limit in some of the States. It has actually levied a tax of 40 cents. It has not done all that it could do. If that county should apply, would it be entitled to receive an allocation under this amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. That question would be a matter for the sound discretion of the authority designated by the President; and, of course, we could not fix the rule here because the rule would vary throughout the country.

Mr. LOGAN. But I am thinking about the floods we have down in our section of the country just now. Here is a county that has no need for a levy, say, above 40 cents. It did not have such need at the time the levy was made. It perhaps has not exhausted its resources, but the flood comes on and destroys its courthouse and its other public buildings. It is necessary for the county to go to the Federal Government and ask an allocation of funds so that it may carry on its work. If the Senator's amendment should be adopted, would not the Senator, or any other good lawyer, if he were representing the President, say, "That county has not exhausted its resources; consequently it can receive no relief"?

The county, we will assume, has already made its levy for 1 year. Perhaps it cannot make another levy until a year later. If it should be held that the county has not exhausted its resources, would it not be barred from receiving any help at all when it most greatly needed it?

Mr. BAILEY. On the Senator's own statement, if the county could not make a levy and had no money in its treasury, the conclusion would be inevitable that for the time being, at least, the county had exhausted its resources.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if for the time being the county has exhausted its resources, its resources have been exhausted—so thinks the Senator?

Mr. BAILEY. On the Senator's statement that it had exhausted its levy, or had made its levy and could not make another, its resources are out, because the levy is the one resource.

Mr. LOGAN. There is another thing I should like to ask the Senator while I am on my feet.

The State of Kentucky—speaking of my own State—has no limitation as to the amount of taxes which may be imposed for State purposes. There is a limitation on the amount of money the State may borrow. If the State of Kentucky should make an application, it could be very readily said that it has not exhausted its resources, because it has not imposed a tax rate sufficient to raise the funds to do the work itself. Would the State of Kentucky automatically be barred from receiving any funds unless it should increase its tax rate so as to take care of the project itself?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there is nothing whatever automatic about the amendment. It is in the discretion of the authority appointed by the President. There is nothing rigid about it.

Mr. LOGAN. The determination as to whether or not a State or a county has exhausted its resources, then, is to be left to the President, or someone designated by him. Would not the question of whether or not it has exhausted its resources be determined by the laws of the State itself?

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President. The amendment provides:

> And thereupon a finding by such authority as the President shall designate that such State, county, city, governmental subdivision, or agency is in actual need of the aid of the Federal Government to provide for its unemployed.

It is very simple. We do not propose to appropriate money for a local project sponsored by a State or county or city or local subdivision unless there is a finding, upon a proper showing, that there is actual need of it. I am glad the Senator asked me the question, because it enables me to clear a misapprehension here which is without any foundation whatever.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Before I yield to the other Senator from Kentucky I desire to say that the junior Senator from Kentucky is predicating his question upon the flood. There will be no State projects that I know of with respect to the flood in Kentucky. That will be Federal.

I now yield to the senior Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator yields to my colleague, will he yield to me further?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Not necessarily was I predicating my questions as to relief upon the flood, because I assume that the Senator's amendment has nothing to do with flood relief or drought relief. That is my understanding.

Mr. BAILEY. It has nothing whatever to do with Federal projects.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all; but the State of Kentucky, we will say, has made application for help in erecting certain buildings which it says it cannot itself erect. The Senator's amendment would leave it to the judgment of someone designated by the President to determine whether or not Kentucky had exhausted its resources. That is such an elusive term, and it is subject to so much resiliency or fluctuation, that I do not know just what the Senator has in mind when he says a certain thing shall be done when a State or a county has "exhausted its resources."

Mr. BAILEY. I wish the junior Senator from Kentucky would read the amendment. It does not say that the President shall find that any county or city or State has exhausted its resources. It says that the State, city, county, governmental subdivision or agency shall have filed with the President a certificate that it has done so. The matter of judgment there is with the local subdivision, and not with the national authority.

Mr. LOGAN. Then may I ask the Senator who is going to determine whether the State, county, or other subdivision has exhausted its resources? I understood the Senator a while ago to say that that would be determined by the President, or someone designated by him. Now, I understand the Senator to say that I misunderstood him.

Mr. BAILEY. No; it is not a question of misunderstanding.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, the question is, Who is going to determine when such a State or political subdivision has exhausted its resources?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me answer the question very plainly. The city or county or State filing the statement determines that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I promised to yield to the senior Senator from Kentucky. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was on the point immediately under discussion that I wished to call the Senator's attention to the language in his amendment. The political subdivision or agency proposing the project has first to file a certificate that it has exhausted its resources to provide for unemployment, and in connection with that statement there must be set out the tax rate, the income, the indebtedness, the budget of such political subdivision or agency, and the number employed therein.

That is not conclusive, I respectfully submit to the Senator from North Carolina, and I suggest that the interpretation of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is well sustained by the language employed, for the reason that the following language in the amendment is attached to the words which require the filing of the statement:

> And thereupon a finding by such authority as the President shall designate that such State, county, city, governmental subdivision, or agency is in actual need of the aid of the Federal Government to provide for its unemployed.

I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that the only legal interpretation that can be made of the amendment as a whole is that two proceedings are necessary in order to qualify a project sponsored by a State or one of its political subdivisions, and those two are, first, the certificate of the political subdivision applying that it has exhausted its resources, to which is attached evidence in support of the same. When that certificate has been filed, and when the evidence has been supplied, before the project can be proceeded with it is necessary for the agency to be set up by the President under the amendment to pass upon and reach a quasi-judicial decision as to whether the facts set out in the certificate are supported by the evidence, and upon that finding, and not until the finding has been made, will the project be proceeded with, according to the language of the amendment itself.

The Senator is kind in yielding, and I realize he has not even begun the main portion of his speech, he has been interrupted very often, and I do not intend to interrupt him further. But I point out that language to him, and I maintain that not only is the construction given by the junior Senator from Kentucky correct but I also insist that it is the only construction which may be placed upon the amendment as a whole. It is not only necessary that the certificate be supplied but it is also necessary that the evidence supporting it be passed upon by a quasi-judicial body set up by the President, and until a favorable decision has been reached by that body the project cannot be proceeded with.

While the Senator has yielded to me, I should like to ask him a question not directly related to the interpretation of the amendment on the point we have been discussing. I should like to ask him whether it is his intention to make the provisions of the amendment applicable to such W. P. A. projects as have already been commenced and on which already there has been the expenditure of Federal funds, or whether it is his intention to limit the application of the amendment to projects hereafter to be proceeded with.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will respond to the latter question first. The amendment relates to all money appropriated for relief in the pending legislation. That would take in all the projects.

With respect to the other matter, I am very glad to have had the discussion as to the meaning of the language. I will review it briefly, and then proceed as far as I may be permitted.

The junior Senator from Kentucky raised the question as to the authority created by the amendment finding that the resources of a political subdivision had been exhausted. My answer to that was that that is not in the amendment. The political subdivision files a statement, its certificate of need. It finds that fact. The authority created by the President reviews the showing made, and then finds actual need prior to allocating the money. I am glad we have that clear.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. At this point may I be permitted to interpolate a matter which I am sure is related to the very subject just now defined by the Senator? I am addressing my query to the situation of the opulent city of Chicago, and ask, when the Senator speaks of resources being exhausted, does the able Senator mean the resources which can be applied for relief, or does he mean all resources, many of which are needed for the police and fire departments, and the maintenance of the city government generally?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, of course I meant the resources applicable to relief. That is all we are discussing.

I was saying that the amendment is reasonable. What is the basis of this relief in our country? Where does the primary responsibility lie? It has always rested upon the localities. The duty of the State of North Carolina—and I can speak for my State—is prior to the duty of the United States to look after the social welfare and the civil rights of the citizens. The Federal Government's obligation is secondary. I intend before I take my seat to show the Senate just what will be the consequences of the inversion of that order and that responsibility. It is the inversion of that order which is causing the trouble in the United States today with the whole relief problem.

Now I shall make my point. My position is Democratic. It was the Democratic Senate in 1932 which took precisely this position. I recall the facts very distinctly, and I am going to give that history this morning, too. I do not wish to go into that at this point, but I shall do so before I conclude.

This amendment is in accord with the attitude and the express words of the President of the United States, too. He said, and has said more than once, that the primary obligation in this matter of relief is upon the States and the local subdivisions. Of course he is right.

I shall not go at any great length into these relationships, but I have mentioned the reasonableness of the proposition, and have also mentioned the policy pursued by our party right in this Chamber as exemplified in the first act in 1932. I have also mentioned the fact that the President of the United States has taken the precise view I have undertaken to put into the statute here, that we must look to the localities primarily.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Illinois asked the Senator from North Carolina a moment ago what he meant by an inquiry into whether or not an agency had exhausted its resources, and the Senator from North Carolina stated that he meant the resources which were applicable to relief. But that may mean that it has exhausted all of its resources, as a matter of fact, under the wording of the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no use having a lot of casuistry about the matter. Insert in the amendment the words "all the resources for relief" and I will agree to it.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well. I wish to ask the Senator what he means by "governmental subdivision or agency." Does he mean a State?

Mr. BAILEY. Counties, townships, cities—anything that comes within the legal definition of a political subdivision; and that term is well defined.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator means a political subdivision of a State?

Mr. BAILEY. A school division is a political subdivision; a county is a political subdivision; a township is a political subdivision.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I am not at all sure but that his proposition is correct. I am merely asking for information and enlightenment with reference to some of the provisions which might be misinterpreted, in my judgment, unless they are clarified.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will clear that at once. I am not insisting on any special language. If any Senator wishes to make a suggestion which will help the amendment, consistent with the principle in view, he will have no trouble with me; I will accept his suggestion.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I desire to make such a suggestion.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I would suggest, then, that the Senator strike out the words "has exhausted its resources" and substitute the words "is unable."

Mr. BAILEY. I will very gladly accept the amendment. Let the words "is unable" be written into the amendment at the desk.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina, I suggest that his amendment be amended by striking out, in line 1 on page 2, the words "has exhausted its resources", and substituting in lieu thereof "is unable."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am delighted to have that done. I do not know that there is a great difference in the language. I shall not debate that point. I desire to go ahead with the argument.

Let us see where we stand, Mr. President. In 3 years and 10 months the Congress of the United States has appropriated nine and one-half billions of dollars for relief. Nine hundred and fifty thousand millions of dollars appropriated for relief in 3 years and 10 months! I shall give the Senate the data in detail. In the same period we have appropriated for relief and recovery combined $14,000,000,000. Here we are in the middle of the fiscal year, not providing for a further period, but providing for a period which we understood we had provided for, called upon to appropriate $755,000,000 to run us 5 more months. That sum is a sum greater than was required to run the entire Government in 1913.

Let us think about that a moment. Let us think at what a headlong rate we are going. It would be a different matter if we were beginning a new fiscal year, but we are trying to carry through a year that we provided for, as we thought, and we are adding $775,000,000 to nine and one-half billions, and that is at the rate of $155,000,000 a month.

Senators, hear me. That is precisely the same rate that we were running at last August. Does that go home to Senators? That is the progress we are making. We propose to spend in May 1937 just as much as we spent in August 1936.

Worse than that, this bill is being tolerated on the floor today upon the promise that within 6 weeks there will be another bill here; and we all know that too. There is a promise outstanding, made in public in the debate here, that another bill shall come in to the Senate, and that that bill shall contain provision for not less than one-half billion dollars. There is the picture and there are the facts. I take it they will give every Senator pause. I take it they are not new. However, I suspect there are very few of us who really can comprehend the import of such facts.

Mr. President, here is the point: We are making no progress whatever in the direction of reducing relief expenditures. There are the facts. February 3, 1937, we are spending more money than we were spending in February 1932, when we were in the trough of the depression; we are now spending more money than we were spending in February 1933, when the banks and the business structures were falling like pines under the force of a tornado.

We are spending more today than we spent when the number of the unemployed, according to the count of the American Federation of Labor, was 9,000,000 more than it is at this hour. Today we are spending at the rate of $155,000,000 a month, notwithstanding we boast that from 7,000,000 to 9,000,000 persons have returned to work, and the director of relief, Mr. Hopkins, tells us that he expects 600,000 more to return to work in the remaining 5 months of the fiscal year.

Senators, there is the situation. This situation cannot be squared with the facts. It cannot be reconciled with the past actions of the Senate. It cannot be explained in any way except this, that we have caught the disease of public expenditure, and it is sweeping our people and ourselves, our States, and our political subdivisions like the black plague itself.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator has referred to February 1932 and February 1933. The Senator knows that we did not even begin to expend money for relief purposes either in February 1932 or in February 1933.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to come to that history.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the Senator also know that in the last Congress we appropriated $1,400,000,000 for relief on the theory that it would be sufficient for the fiscal year, but that the $1,400,000,000 has now been exhausted during the first 6 months of that period, and that the bill now before us calls for only $790,000,000 for the rest of the fiscal year, which is a considerable reduction below the $1,400,000,000 of the previous 6 months?

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; I think I shall show the Senate before I take my seat that my statement is good. I am going to give the whole detail of it; that we are appropriating and spending more now than we ever did before, and the very fact that the bill before us calls for $155,000,000 a month is sufficient evidence of that. We did spend a slightly greater amount than that for a month or two. However, I have the data here, and I am going to read them into the RECORD. I have had the averages made.

I am going to pass by this portion of my argument with the following statement: My point is that notwithstanding we fill the air with the music of "prosperity", have our banquets and sing Happy Days are Here Again; notwithstanding our great political convention at Philadelphia, when nothing else on earth but that could be heard—and those who were there will bear me witness that that is the fact—notwithstanding 9,000,000 men, according to the statistics of the American Federation of Labor which I have on my desk, have returned to work; notwithstanding there is a great measure of recovery, of which we are both proud and glad; notwithstanding the industrial output is as great today as it was at the end of the year 1929—and if Senators wish to get evidence on that point they can refer to the index printed in the Analyst for the New York Times—notwithstanding that the national income has been lifted from $38,000,000,000 to about $60,000,000,000—and the Department of Commerce tells us that this year we have a right to hope that the national income will be further lifted to $66,000,000,000 or $68,000,000,000—notwithstanding all that, the demand for money and the disposition to appropriate money is as strong today as it was in the days of 1933 and 1934, when the whole country was destitute. There is the situation.

Mr. President, I have brought out these facts——

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will let me finish my statement, I shall be glad to yield.

I have brought out these facts, Mr. President, by way of calling to the attention of the Senate and, I hope, to the attention of some people in the country, the simple fact that we have fallen into a system which will inevitably increase the demand and inevitably make it impossible for Senators and Members of the House of Representatives to resist those demands. I am going into that subject.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming for the sake of argument that what the Senator has said is true—that is, that there are only a few of us in the Senate who are able to comprehend his point of view—nevertheless the Senator's amendment will not change the situation, as I see it.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad the Senator raised that question. My amendment will, as I shall undertake to show—and I am giving the background of the amendment now—my amendment will at least tend to place the responsibility back upon the local subdivisions and take it off the Federal Government, and I intend to show that so long as this responsibility rests upon the Federal Government there is not a chance of balancing the Budget, there is not a chance of arresting the tide which is now flowing. That is just the point.

Mr. President, I am now going into the history of this question very briefly, but I think it is worth our while to do so. On the 22d day of December 1931, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] introduced his famous bill to appropriate $5,500,000,000 for relief. That was at the end of 1931, and things were dark then. Fourteen or fifteen millions of men were helpless in America. We defeated the bill, and that is not without significance.

Then came along the bill that was known in the other House as House bill 12445, famous as the Garner bill. We passed the bill; the President of the United States vetoed it. That bill was introduced June 3, 1932.

Then again the Senator from Wisconsin introduced, as a substitute for the Garner bill, his public-works bill, calling again for an appropriation of five and one-half billion dollars. We Democrats defeated it. Five billion five hundred million dollars was entirely too much then. And that was for public works.

Then in the summer, as I recall, of 1932, just as the Congress was about to adjourn, a bill was introduced, being Public Law No. 302, Seventy-second Congress, appropriating $300,000,000 to be loaned to States for the relief of the destitute. That was a Democratic bill. We asserted then the principle of primary State responsibility, and that was the right principle. That bill passed, and included in it there was an additional appropriation of $322,224,000 for emergency public works.

In the summer of 1932—and if there ever was a dark time in America that was the dark time; conditions were probably worse in February 1933, but not greatly worse—the Democratic Party had not quite a majority in the Senate, the parties being about evenly divided, as I recall, but the Democratic leadership and a Democratic House thought that $622,224,000 was sufficient; three hundred million of it as loans to States and $322,224,000 for public works.

There were twice as many unemployed then as there are now; there was more destitution and there was no hope whatever. We thought $150,000,000 less than we are called upon today to appropriate as a supplement to the existing appropriation was sufficient, and it proved to be sufficient.

I never heard that anybody starved in America in 1932 and 1933; I did not hear that any State failed to take care of its people; I did not hear of any city that lay down on the job. O Mr. President, we gave to the city of New York last year more money than we were willing to loan to all the States in 1932. I am showing how the thing grows.

Then the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in December 1932 when the Congress resumed its deliberations introduced a bill providing for $500,000,000. The Democratic House defeated that measure. Nobody starved; nobody suffered; and the Democratic Party went into the election of 1933 with that record of having defeated the bill, and we did not hesitate to proclaim that we had done so.

Then, in 1933, the first relief measure passed appropriated $148,000,000 for the Civilian Conservation Corps, and reforestation. That bill was introduced on March 21, 1933. We followed that on April 4, 1933, with an appropriation of $500,000,000, and the act authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make that sum available for emergency relief to be spent by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. That was the first time the principle of Federal responsibility for direct relief was written into the law, and in that instance the appropriation was only $500,000,000. Here we are today, after having appropriated nine and a half billion dollars for relief, called upon in the middle of the fiscal year to appropriate more to supplement the existing appropriation than we appropriated for a whole year in April 1933.

In March 1933, Mr. Doughton introduced in the House of Representatives the national recovery measure to foster fair competition, and so on, which carried a $3,300,000,000 appropriation for the construction of certain useful public works. That was for building and construction by the Federal Government, and, of course, there is quite a difference between that and relief.

Then, in the relief act of 1933, for the continuation of the civil works program, we appropriated $950,000,000.

Then, on June 30, 1934, in the bill to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations, Congress appropriated $1,225,000,000, of which some $500,000,000 was for public works, $525,000,000 for drought and farm relief, $119,000,000 for roads and forest work, and $65,000,000 for public buildings. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will appreciate the point that the appropriation in that instance for relief was only $500,000,000. And that was in June 1934, when "happy days" were not here again.

Then, on January 23, 1935, a measure introduced in the House, House Joint Resolution 117, appropriated $4,000,000,000, to which the Senate added $800,000,000 of the funds of the R. F. C. which had not been used and which represented unexpended balances.

Then, in 1936, on May 7—that was the date of the introduction of the measure—we added to all the previous amounts the sum of $2,375,281,000, of which $1,425,000,000 was for relief.

Mr. President, there are the facts. Facilis descensus averni—easy the road to ruin.

Mr. LEWIS. Easy the road to hell.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Illinois gives a more literal interpretation, but I did not care to read it that way into the RECORD. It is easy to make appropriations; it is easy not to resist; it is easy to disregard the obligations to maintain the currency of the country; it is easy to expand our own sense of our benevolence; it is easy to speak of the greatness of our hearts at the public expense; but where are the hearts to guard the welfare of their country; where are the hearts to resist the menace the seeds of which we ourselves have sown? Mr. President, there is the story.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator concede that present relief funds are practically exhausted and that the continuation of relief will have to depend upon a new appropriation made now?

Mr. BAILEY. That is my understanding; otherwise, why are we called upon to make the appropriation?

Mr. BULKLEY. Exactly. Referring again to the answer the Senator recently made to the Senator from Arkansas, if his amendment is adopted, all the funds which we are now about to appropriate and authorize will be tied up until the necessary certificate shall have been made and passed upon by some Federal authority.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. BULKLEY. What then will be the situation?

Mr. BAILEY. The whole Federal works projects would go on; the whole Federal relief would go on. The amendment relates only to State, county, city, and local subdivision projects—a little dam at the head of the stream. My amendment would not stop relief, and I would not be here to stop it. I am sorry the money is exhausted, but it is exhausted; and I know that I have got to vote for the appropriation. I am trying, however, to apply a little brake or impose a little restraint by way of saying to the counties and the cities and the States, "The Federal Government has gone far enough, God knows; you have been rescued; your credit is restored. So, when you have a project, will you not be good enough to say to the Government of which you ask the money whether or not you are able to carry it on?" That is my entire proposition. I do not intend to stop the business. I could not do so if I wished.

Mr. BULKLEY. Perhaps I was only half right in my assumption then, but certainly the projects sponsored by local subdivisions call for a very large proportion of the money that is now being expended by the W. P. A.; and, as I understand, the Senator's amendment would halt all of them instanter until the requirement proposed by his amendment had been complied with.

Mr. BAILEY. It would not take 10 days.

Mr. BULKLEY. To review all the projects in the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. Let us assume the Senator has a project in his State——

Mr. BULKLEY. But there are many projects under way already, and I take it that under the Senator's amendment no money could be expended on any of them until all of these facts should be determined and passed upon by a Federal authority.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am frank to say I do not think that is practicable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, if a schoolhouse is half finished, being sponsored by a city or school district, or a highway, sponsored by a State or highway commission, or a sidewalk, sponsored by a city, or any other thing that is now being done sponsored by any subdivision of the State or by the State itself, it would have to be held up until the authority designated in the Senator's amendment had a chance to pass upon whether that State, county, city, or district had done its full share in contributing to that enterprise.

Mr. BAILEY. I realize the force of what the Senator has said. I realize that is what will be said next year when we try to do this same thing, and it is what will be said the year after that and the year following that. It is a very good argument to carry on the policy, but what do we say to the simple proposition? Grant there will be some delay. Grant there will be some disturbance. Here is a city with its project. We simply say to the city, "Show the need, otherwise you do not get any money." If the city has not the need, we tell them to get the money. If they have it, we tell them to go ahead and continue the project.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. In just a moment. The Senator from Kentucky refers to a city building a sidewalk. That is one of the things going on in the country now. There is not a city in America that cannot build its own sidewalks. Cities are building swimming pools and country clubs with Federal money. I know all about that. I see it everywhere I go. The city that cannot build its own jail ought not to be a city. The city that cannot pave its own streets has not any business being a city. We have people down in my State indexing city records. If a city cannot index its own records it had better go out of business.

I am talking perfectly plain and possibly may make some enemies, but that is all right. We have reached the point where the subdivisions are lying down on the United States all over America, and I am trying to stop it. I am going to say something about some of the cities before I get through.

I yield now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that very shortly a bill for flood relief will be introduced in Congress, as it probably should be, because flood relief is a national catastrophe. The Congress, I am sure, will deal very liberally as far as concerns the unfortunate people distressed by the flood. However, in the expenditure of that money it will not be spent in Maine or in New Mexico or in Florida. It will be spent only where the need exists. Therefore, it seems to me, if we can expend money for flood relief where the need exists, the principle might well be applied to other places in the country, so that no city or town or State which can take care of itself may come to Congress and get any money. Certainly we are applying that principle in flood relief, and I do not see why it should not be applied everywhere, because it is not our mission to help cities which are already able to help themselves, but we should help those which are not able to help themselves.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to submit a question of interpretation of the Senator's amendment. Under the P. W. A. certain projects are applied for by cities or counties or States or other subdivisions where there is a grant of 45 percent and a loan of 55 percent on the theory that the State or the county or the city can put up 55 percent of the amount required to complete the project and that the Government will make a grant of the other 45 percent, the 55 percent to be repaid according to the terms of the contract.

What effect would the Senator's amendment have upon the ability of the P. W. A.? In the event any of these funds should be allocated, as the President might do, to the P. W. A. for that purpose, would his amendment require that the certificate should show that the State or the county or city was unable to do all the project or any part of it? What would be required under the provisions of the Senator's amendment? If they were able to do a part of it, but not all of it, would they still be barred?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator sets up a hypothesis. He wants to know what would happen if some of this money went to the P. W. A. The truth of the matter is if that is the way it is going, the whole thing is out the window. Mr. Hopkins came to us and said he wanted it for the W. P. A. I think he told the truth. I shall discuss that point if the Senator from Kentucky wishes me to do so. If any of this money is going to the P. W. A., I would not suggest the United States Government impairing the obligation of its contract even if it could. I am willing to have an amendment inserted providing that my amendment shall not be authority to anybody for the United States Government to impair the obligation of existing contracts.

Mr. President, there was some reason in 1933 for the Government to plunge into the business of relief. I think in the summer of 1933 the credit of the States was pretty well exhausted. I think most of the cities were prostrate, and the counties likewise. The people were not paying their taxes. Bonds were being defaulted. I am not criticizing the policy of Federal aid when Federal aid was needed, but I am arguing here that now that there is a great measure of recovery, now that cities and States and counties and townships do collect their taxes, now that they can sell their bonds in Wall Street bearing 2½ to 3 percent interest, now that they are restored, as they are restored, practically throughout the country, they should get out of the psychology of dependence and out of the begging attitude which was necessary in 1933 and stand upon their own feet, assume their responsibilities, and do their duty.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to the Senator, assuming there is a State or county or city financially able to take care of its unemployed, that there is no inducement for the county or city to do that, because as long as everybody else is getting a share of Federal money, the county or city or State is likewise forced to come in to protect itself. There will never be any elimination of counties or cities or States which are able to take care of their own unemployed so long as funds are appropriated in the fashion that is now being done, because those cities and towns have to pay it all off anyhow and why should not they come and get some of it as long as it is going around?

If the Congress of the United States wants to squander billions from the National Treasury, which have to come from taxes, in a fashion like that where it is not needed, then all this talk about balancing the Budget and making our income and outgo meet is just so much wasted effort. I do not believe we are ever going to balance the Budget unless we appropriate only upon the basis of need.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has anticipated what I was about to say, and I am very much obliged to him. That is just the fatality in the policy of exclusive Federal responsibility. It results in setting up a competition amongst the States. I am going into that matter, and I am going to give the data; and the Senator will be amazed to see what is happening in this competition.

I am not going to quote anybody by name. I am not going to tell any secrets; but I am not the only man in the Congress who has heard other Members of the Congress say that they had to demand relief for their States as a matter of self-defense. I do not mean personal self-defense, either. I am not equal to the degree of heroism which would be required if I should sit here and let New York State take all the Federal money, knowing very well that the hour will come when 3,400,000 of my constituents in my State will have to pay the bill. We have to get our share in order to save our States.

Let me take an illustration of North Carolina. Last year North Carolina got about $18,000,000 of W. P. A. funds. What will North Carolina pay for that $18,000,000? North Carolina will pay $2 for every dollar she got. Is it my duty to reduce that proportion, or to let the people of my State be put in a position where they will have to pay $3? There is the computation. I would not say anything that would wound the feelings of my fellow Senators, but it is a dead race in American politics today as to who can get the most money.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In what way does the Senator say that North Carolina will pay back $2 for every dollar she got?

Mr. BAILEY. I will show the Senator. North Carolina's share of this fund, when it comes to pay day, will be three times what she got; and Kentucky's share will, too, for that matter, I am glad to tell the Senator from Kentucky. The money is not going to Kentucky, and it is not going to North Carolina, and it is not going out West, either. I have the data here, and if Senators will listen to me I will tell them exactly where the money is going. It is not going for the drought, either. There was not any drought in New York City. I will show you where it is going. Now, let us find out where the taxes go, and who pays the bill in America. There never has been any doubt in my mind about that.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not mean to say that all this relief money is going into New York City, does he?

Mr. BAILEY. I will show the Senator where it is going. Seventeen percent of it went to New York State; 35 percent of it went to three States; 50 percent of it went to six States. Those are the facts that are in the RECORD, and I will give the Senator the figures.

Mr. WHEELER. A few years ago, when we were asking for drought relief, I remember some of the New York Senators standing on their feet and saying that "New York would take care of her own"; that they did not want any help from the Federal Government.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, New York has taken care of her own. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to reflect on the Senator's State. I am going to tell the facts; and when I said New York took care of her own, if the Senator feels that I was saying something wrong, I will take it back.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I said something like the Senator from Montana has said. I am not willing to have my State given any money if the State itself can pay the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. That is just what my amendment provides, and I thank the Senator. I am in the same situation. I will walk out of this relief business tomorrow morning and take the responsibility in the Commonwealth of North Carolina if the rest of America will, and by so doing I will make $2 for every one my Commonwealth now gets.

Mr. WHEELER. But, if I may interrupt the Senator again, the time did come when the city of New York—the greatest and the wealthiest city in the United States, if not in the world—came to the Congress of the United States for appropriations out of the Treasury of the United States, stating that they were unable to handle the relief situation in that great city, the richest city in the United States, if not in the world. That is true.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield again? I am sorry to break in on his remarks.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. We have, of course, in New York City not only the greatest wealth in the country but the greatest poverty. I have no question at all that New York City, as a city, did generously as a municipality and from private charity. It may well be that it was necessary to have some outside funds.

I do not want any poverty in my city to go to the extent of hunger; and when I see queues in front of employment bureaus on Sixth Avenue, and know that the persons in those queues cannot secure any employment, I realize that aid must come from some source.

So in time of extremity, yes; help must come from some outside source; but, I repeat, I do not want my State to be given any money from the Federal Treasury so long as my State is able to make the contributions necessary to take care of its own citizens.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have been in the Senate now for 6 years, and I have never refused to yield, and I am always going to yield when I can. I think the debate has been valuable, and I am glad I have yielded up to this time; but, while I dislike to say so, I am not able to stay on my feet much longer. I have not been well for at least 2 weeks, and therefore I shall ask Senators to let me conclude without yielding further.

Mr. COPELAND. I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the Senator from New York would not on any occasion interrupt me except on good grounds. I am not complaining, and I should not say what I am saying but for the fact that I wish to finish. I would not run away from a debate, and I would not let anybody think I would not be willing to answer questions; but I am not able to hold the floor much longer. That is my difficulty.

I wish to respond to what was said by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] as to who pays the taxes. Now let us discuss that question.

A tax is put on a power company. Who pays the tax? The consumer pays the tax. The tax does not come out of the capital structure. It comes out of the profits. Probably all taxes other than inheritance or estate taxes filter on down to the man who works and produces the raw material. The income tax of the corporation comes out of the consumer; or, when it does not come out of the consumer, it comes out of the employee through reducing his wages. Even the income tax of individuals to a large extent filters down. The more I get by way of a big income, the less some consumer gets, or the less some merchant gets. All taxes are passed on, and the United States Government tax system is based on that principle. It is indirect taxation. It is purposely built on that foundation. Under our system we cannot have direct taxes. We have indirect taxes, with a view to having them passed on.

Here we come to pay this bill of nine and a half billion dollars. When we pass this appropriation bill it will be $10,000,000,000. Who pays the bill? Does New York City pay it? Does some millionaire sitting back in a bank, indulging in the luxuries of a great palace, pay it? No; he never has, and never will. He writes the check; but the worker, the farmer, the laborer, the consumer, pay the bill. There is not any better way on earth to impoverish your population than to grind them down to the earth with taxes imposed in the first instance upon people other than themselves. It is the surest way to exterminate them.

Here we are today, with $8,000,000,000 in 1936 and $8,000,000,000 in 1937 in our National Budgets; and take it from me, if you will read the Budget message of the President, there is $8,000,000,000 predicated again in the 1938 Budget. There is not a chance of reducing the tax structure. Figure that. It is 13 percent of the national income this year. Add to that the expenses of the counties and the States, at least twelve or thirteen billion dollars more. The total is 25 percent of the earnings of the workers of America, of the farmers in the field, of the dwellers in the little homes—25 percent! Whether they know it or not, whether they sleep or whether they eat or whether they put on clothes, they pay the bill.

Now I will divide it pro rata. Take North Carolina. The population of North Carolina is, in round numbers, one-fortieth of that of the entire American Union. I am not going into the taxes that we appear to pay, because that would be a one-sided comparison. We pay $300,000,000 by way of transmission to Washington, though not actually. But divide it by 40. North Carolina's taxes, on the per capita basis, are $250,000,000, to liquidate that indebtedness—probably long after we all have died—at the rate we are paying will take 90 years. Look at the Budget. What are we doing today? Sooner or later it will come home to the wages of workers, either in increased cost of living or in decreased wage. It will come home to the reward of the farmer, either in higher prices for what he buys or in lower prices for what he sells. We cannot have such taxes incorporated in our economic system without having them impinge upon the wage and the reward of the farmer and the worker.

North Carolina stands to pay out $250,000,000. What will she get? She has so far gotten, I think, about $60,000,000. I read one statement indicating that the amount was about $72,000,000. Put it down. I said she would lose $2 for every dollar she got. There is my statement. Now apply it to your own State.

Do not be misled. The theory that North Carolina is not paying for this is ridiculous. Who else pays for it if we do not? Do we fancy to ourselves, because we lift the rates in the higher brackets, that we are getting the money from the rich? Look at the returns. We get our money from the people of low income, to begin with. But, even if we did not, who pays the tobacco tax of the United States—6 cents on a pack of cigarettes? The man on relief pays his part; the people on the streets pay their part. That amounts to about $400,000,000. The tobacco farmer pays his part, too, because it depresses the price. That is my point about that.

Now let us get into something else. The first reason for my amendment is that the counties, the cities, and the States have been delivered from a burden. Will they go ahead and resume their duty?

I stated just now, in passing, that the plan now in operation brings every delegation in the Congress, every State in the Union, to the point of competition for funds. I believe I will make a statement on the floor here in the Senate of a personal character. One of my opponents in the primary last May heralded all over the State that I was not fit to be in the Senate because I had not gotten more money for the State of North Carolina; but I defeated him. Every Senator here knows that that may be his experience; every Member of the House of Representatives knows it may be his. I cannot consent that my Commonwealth shall be ruined. I cannot consent that all this money shall be drained out of North Carolina. I do not know that I can consent that my Commonwealth shall be taking care of the poor in New York State. I would do it in a great emergency; I would forget all about the localities and all about the States and think in terms of the national necessity and the national welfare. But the time for that has passed.

Mr. President, as long as that competition is maintained we are going to have increasing appropriations. That is my point. The moment we go back to local responsibility we will have reduced appropriations. The only way to stop this thing is to reassert in America the sense of local obligation and of local responsibility; and when I say that, I am standing on historic ground. That is America. That is the Constitution. That is the character of the great Republic.

The way we are going the Republic will be burned down. That is what is going to happen. I am not an alarmist, but we cannot go on spending money at the present rate; we cannot go on with an unbalanced Budget forever. We have gone on for 6 years with the Budget unbalanced, and we cannot go on spending $8,000,000,000 a year with a revenue of five and a half. We cannot keep on accumulating debts without wrecking the currency and wrecking the whole economic system.

Our great country having saved the States and the counties and the cities, having saved the unemployed, having saved the destitute, in order that it may save itself, should now, by way of my amendment, make a modest gesture and say to the counties, the States, and the cities, "In the time of need the great Republic did its duty at great cost and without flinching, but now that you are on your feet, go back to your duty, go back to your obligation, and stand with us while we undertake to save the Republic from the wreck and the ruin of a constantly unbalanced Budget." I shall not discuss the effect of that.

I wish to show in the next place, Mr. President, how this system of national responsibility works injustice, and I am going to give some facts and figures. I shall compare New York and North Carolina according to the tables submitted to me by the Works Progress Administration.

North Carolina gets eight-tenths of 1 percent of the W. P. A. funds; New York gets 17 percent—more than 17 times as much in percentage.

New York gets $4 per capita every time North Carolina gets $1 per capita. Three States in the United States—New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois—get 35 percent of the total fund; and I will print a table showing that.

New York gets more than all the Southern States together, and I include Maryland and Kentucky and Tennessee, the border States. Do Senators get the force of that? New York is rich and great. The per-capita wealth in New York is three times the per-capita wealth in North Carolina, but North Carolina, under the present system, is contributing to the destitute and the unemployed in New York.

The per-capita income in New York in the year 1933—and I will put the data in the RECORD to show this also—was three times the per-capita income in North Carolina. Rich and great New York gets 17 percent of the W. P. A. funds and North Carolina gets eight-tenths of 1 percent.

My State is not singular; Senators can go to the Mississippi River and look all the way across the great empire of the West and can put all those States together, and they will find that New York gets more than all of them.

I want to make myself perfectly safe about that. Count Illinois as in the East, and leave off California; then take all the rest of the western part of the country, and it will be found that New York State gets more than all the other States put together. New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan, and Massachusetts get half the money.

It is said the money went for drought relief and that we lost it on the drought. We did not do any such thing. Consider the drought-stricken States, and it will be seen they did not get the money.

Half of the whole sum goes to six States. Seventy percent of the whole sum goes to 12 States. That is what is going on in America. That is the inevitable consequence of the system of national aid without local responsibility.

Hear me, Senators! The W. P. A. wage in New York State is $65 a month. It is $27 a month in North Carolina. When our industrialists came to Washington under the N. R. A. and humbly begged for a differential of 10 percent on account of climate and freight rates they were denied; but when the time comes to distribute the national money an unemployed man working in New York gets $65 a month, and an unemployed man working in North Carolina gets $27. The same applies to other Southern States.

Another thing, in North Carolina the local project sponsors, the counties and cities, are required to put up 20 percent. They put up 6 percent in New York. Remember, that is the Empire State, the richest State in the American Union. In that State is the greatest city on earth. I have the data here showing its wealth. It is the wealthiest city in the world. Walk its streets, and it will be seen that its wealth crowds the skies themselves; and the sponsors of projects in that State put up 6 percent, while in my State they put up 20 percent. They get 17 percent of the money; the sponsors in my State get eight-tenths of 1 percent.

Mr. President, these are facts, and they cannot be controverted. I am going to put these data in the RECORD; and if anyone in the administration raises a question as to the figures, he will raise a question as to the administration's own data. I got them from Mr. Hopkins' office and the Department of Commerce. I have not made up anything. These are the facts.

There is the situation. The Senate can adopt my amendment if it desires, and it will put some brakes on this thing, or the Senate can defeat my amendment and then we can go on down the road and see where in some States 20 percent must be put up locally while New York puts up 6 percent, and those States will get 3 percent or 2 percent or less than 1 percent while New York gets 17 percent, and I will tell Senators what the fate of their States will be. Their States will be destroyed by the constant drain of taxes out of the State.

Where is the money coming from? And to whom does it go? We talk about relieving the unemployed and the poor. Every dollar of this money goes to merchants. Sixty-five dollars is paid in New York, or $27 is paid in North Carolina as an average monthly wage to an unemployed man. Do not think for one moment that money rests in his pocket beyond the time that he can get down to the grocery store. That money goes into the hands of the merchants. From the merchants it goes to the jobber. From the jobber it goes to the wholesaler. From the wholesaler it goes to the manufacturer, and then to the bank. It never stops until it comes into the hands of somebody who is able to save it. There it goes. We are pouring billions of dollars into these three States or these five States, into these great cities. It is being drained out of our local situation. We do not realize it because the first impression of money expended, when it is borrowed, is that of wealth, and the impression of poverty never comes until the creditor calls for the payment of his note.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I correctly understand the Senator to say that the wages paid in New York are $65 a month?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, Mr. President; that is in the hearings.

Mr. BORAH. And that in North Carolina the wages are $27 a month?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator any further comparison between the States?

Mr. BAILEY. The average of monthly wage rates of all the States is contained in the table printed in the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

Mr. BORAH. And that will be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BAILEY. That is in the report which I have on my desk. The table in question is contained in the printed hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives in charge of deficiency appropriations. I shall be glad to show the table to the Senator. The table is headed "Average assigned monthly wage rate and average hourly earnings of persons employed on Works Progress Administration projects, by States." I will give the figure relating to the State of Idaho. In Idaho the average assigned monthly wage rate is $48.65. In Georgia it is $31.44. In Florida it is $31.40. In Maine it is $50.35. In Massachusetts it is $66.94. I said the wage rate for New York was $65. In New York City it is $75.33, and in New York—exclusive of New York City—it is $63.18. This table appears on page 110 of the House hearings.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that a wide differential is made, even within the States, between the cities within the States and smaller towns and villages in the States. There is a very wide differential in the actual wages paid; and I think the Senator from North Carolina very properly called attention to the fact that when the Government is fixing wages on the basis of the actual value of the wage paid, not even 10 percent in wage differential between the highest wage areas under Mr. Hopkins' administration was permitted to communities and sections that were suffering from the most disadvantageous freight rates and most illogical and unjust charges that were ever imposed upon a section.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall now move on. I am going to make the next point, which is that the system of national responsibility will not only bring on this competition and this expenditure, but it will inevitably bring on an unpreventable extravagance. What did it cost as overhead to run the W. P. A. last year? It cost $99,000,000, in round numbers—almost $100,000,000 a year. I am not going to criticize Mr. Hopkins. If there is placed in one man's disposition that amount of money it would be a miracle if there were no extravagance. I suppose there never was a nobler man in the world than Prof. Rex Tugwell. He was a paragon of virtue. We gave him $100,000,000. [Exhibiting document.] He left us a memorial. [Laughter.] I shall not blame Mr. Tugwell. I do not know but that I might do the same thing if I were given that amount of money to spend. I have never been tempted. There is his memorial. It was said on the floor yesterday that it would cost $1.05, is worth about 5 cents, but it sells for 40 cents.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, is the Senator referring to the statement I made?

Mr. BAILEY. I heard some of it; yes.

Mr. BYRNES. The statement I made was that the $1.05 was only for the cost of the map on the last page.

Mr. BAILEY. The map on the last page cost $1.05, but the whole thing sells for 40 cents. That is business! I will tell the Senate now that that kind of business is not going to work in the molasses trade. [Laughter.] I am glad Mr. Tugwell has gone into molasses. [Laughter.] It was the very thing he needed. After he has been in molasses about 5 years he may make a pretty good public servant and add all his practical experience to his theories.

I read the other day that Mr. Hopkins is about to get a job at an immense salary with a great mail-order house. The best thing that could happen to this country would be for him to get that job. I would be glad if we were to give him $25,000 a year just for the money we would save by his going into that business. [Laughter.] He needs practical experience. I am not going to criticize him. These men who spend the public money ought to have some experience in the difficulty of making a dollar.

I think the document I have exhibited is a great symbol. It is not simply a book—it is a symbol. There is a map of the United States, and, Senators, observe its color! Dr. Tugwell has painted the whole country over with molasses. [Laughter.] He knew what he was doing by way of telling us good-bye. I also observe the Christmas trees. The only thing I could criticize about the whole business is that in placing his illustration on the portion of the map representing Virginia, he has a picture of a bowlegged man riding a pig. I do not know which of the Virginia Senators he is referring to, but I have my idea. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, $99,000,000 is the amount spent for overhead. Let us take the item of traveling expenses. What do Senators suppose was spent on traveling expenses last year by this organization? Five million four hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars. I wonder where on earth they could have been going. Five million four hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars for traveling expenses! They were going somewhere, but where they got to I do not know.

The item of communications, telephone and telegraph, $2,328,000. Two million three hundred and twenty-eight thousand dollars for talking! Can Senators imagine that? They had the free franking privilege. They must have sat up all night talking over the long-distance telephone, and they must have kept the typewriters busy typing messages for the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph. Two million three hundred and twenty-eight thousand dollars! That is what we get by appropriating this tremendous sum and putting it into the hands of one man and telling him to go through it. I am not blaming him. I myself have never been tempted in that way.

Senators, if the matter of administration of relief is returned, is given back to the States, the counties, and the cities and the towns, if my little amendment, which is just a modest little stopper in the most tentative sort of way, shall be adopted, we shall get rid of this extravagance. The principle of local self-government and local accountability will stop such extravagance where we are perfectly helpless, and we know we are helpless.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator believe that such items of extravagance as those to which he has just referred are inevitably inherent in any system of lump-sum appropriations? In other words, does the Senator believe that under the ordinary budgetary plan to which we have heretofore adhered in this country, any one could have come before us with an item of more than $5,000,000 for traveling expenses for the officers of the Resettlement Administration, or an item of $2,500,000 for communications over the telephone and telegraph, in addition to the postal communications, which are frankable, and have received approval thereof? Does the Senator think that if anyone had come in here in the ordinary way with items such as that, it would have been possible to have them approved by the Senate?

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; and if Professor Tugwell had come in with items such as that I do not think he would have had them approved by the Congress. If the Resettlement Administration had come down to our city of Raleigh with any such items, it would not have received approval of them. We should have stopped any such thing. In any local community, town or city, or in any State there would not have been approval of any such expenditures. However, I say that so long as we pursue this system we are going to have increased demands and increased extravagance.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me along that line?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. A few moments ago I made the statement that my information was that the map referred to by the Senator cost $1.05. I am informed that in making that statement I was in error, that the total cost of the report was $1.05.

Mr. BAILEY. That is what I said to begin with.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course it is easy to pick out an item of $2,000,000 for communication over a period of a year, as a single isolated item of expenditure, and criticize it without knowing the detailed information as to the necessity for carrying on the communication in the manner in which it was carried on.

No one knows how much the War Department has spent during the last 2 weeks for long-distance telephone messages from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and all their tributaries, on account of the flood. I do not know what the appropriation is for the War Department per annum for telephone messages; I do not know how much leeway they have with respect to such matters; but I know there is none whatever allowed for messages that Members of the Senate and House of Representatives transmit on public matters. I dread to see my own long-distance telephone bill for the last 2 weeks of January when it comes in during the present month, for I have not stopped to consider how much it would cost me to call up the mayor of a city or the Governor of a State or a city manager or somebody in the relief organization, nor have I stopped to consider how much it would cost me for them to call me up and reverse the charges in an emergency of this kind. I imagine, however, when the War Department comes here with its bill for long-distance telephone calls and telegraphic communications growing out of the emergency incident to the flood it will be entirely possible for some Senator to criticize the amount involved without knowing the necessity for it or the urgency of it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Kentucky says he "imagines." It takes a lot of imagination to explain the expenditure of $2,400,000 for long-distance telephone messages and telegrams by the W. P. A. It takes a lot of imagination to explain how they spent five and a half billion dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the Senator compared his figures with those of other departments that have similar charges?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not. I am merely dealing with this one. It may be that other departments have been doing worse; I do not know as to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think it is quite fair at this point to pick out an item of expenditure by the W. P. A. for communications without making some fair comparison between it and other departments?

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is perfectly fair. I would not measure one department of the American Government by another. The fact that the Army has spent a billion dollars would not justify the Navy in spending an equal amount; the fact that the Department of State spent $5,000 would not justify the Interior Department in spending such a sum. I do not know that the standard is fixed in that way. I am merely giving the figures. If other Senators think they are all right, very well; but I think they are extravagant, and I cannot explain them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wish to give the Senator just a bit of encouragement. It is rather microscopic, but it is encouraging. The Joint Committee on Printing this morning unanimously made it impossible for any more "bonanza catalogs" such as Dr. Tugwell edited before he left to be printed hereafter at public expense. That is all over.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad to hear that. If a joint committee must be depended upon to stop these things of which I am complaining, we know they will never be stopped. I am making the point that the principle of the whole scheme must be reversed. We have got to go back to local expenditures. I do not think I have to elaborate on that point. Let the little city in which you live be careless in the expenditure of money and there is an immediate accountability; but let the Federal Government spend its money and the citizen down in North Carolina cannot possibly hold the Government to account. He cannot know what is going on.

Hear me, Senators—and I am going to take my seat in a moment—when I say this country is built on local self-government and local responsibility, and whenever it gets off that path it is going to mean the end of it; that is all it can mean. Every great civilization for 500 years has been based on local self-government and local accountability. It is just as wrong to centralize the expenditure of relief money in Washington as it is to centralize in Washington the control of the social and civil life of the people throughout America. It will have the same consequence; it cannot safely be done.

Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say. I am unwilling to fail to do something to turn the tide back in the direction of local responsibility. I am doing it at the right time, for the counties, the cities, the towns, and the States are restored again; they are well off. I am unwilling to sit here and see half the public moneys appropriated for relief go to six American States. I know that is unfair; I know it is not meeting the relief situation. The people in need are not concentrated in six States. I should like to think that we could solve the problem of employment by getting rid of half of it in six States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to call to the Senator's attention the fact that a bill was introduced in the Congress, and, I believe, passed by this body, permitting cities to go into municipal bankruptcy because at the time that bill was introduced and passed there were some cities in the country that had lost their credit; there were some cities that could not borrow to meet the needs of their respective communities. That is the reason that form of relief was provided on a widespread scale. But, so far as I know now, even the cities which asked for the passage of the municipal bankruptcy bill no longer ask for it; the need has passed; and now that the need has passed, it seems to me that we should use that as an additional reason for not continuing the relief which was justified at least in that widespread fashion, because at the very time we were passing the bill cities in some cases did not have any credit, which is a condition which does not exist today.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I am unwilling not to do my part to reassert the principle of State function and State duty. I am here to defend the rights of the States. I am here to affirm the duties of the States. I know it is an easy thing merely to pass it all up to the Federal Government, and it is the popular thing, too; but I know what the consequence will be. It will not only mean extravagance; it will not only mean ever-increasing expenditures, but it can never be stopped this side of an inflation, which would destroy the country; it can never be stopped this side of a national socialism that would repudiate the Republic.

Mr. President, I now read from the Democratic platform, not the 1932 platform, but the 1936 platform. This is not a last year's bird's nest in my judgment.

> We are determined to reduce the expenses of Government.
>
> We are determined to do it.
> We are being aided therein by the recession in unemployment.

That is the assurance expressed last June 1936. Those who wrote the platform were including all the expenses of Government and not merely its ordinary expenses.

> We are being aided therein by the recession in unemployment. As the requirements of relief decline and national income advances, an increasing percentage of Federal expenditures can and will be met from current revenues, secured from taxes levied in accordance with ability to pay. Our retrenchment, tax, and recovery programs thus reflect our firm determination to achieve a balanced Budget and the reduction of the national debt at the earliest possible moment.

Thus declared the Democratic platform. That is in the record. I stand on that platform. I stood before the people of North Carolina on it. It is my covenant, and I am standing on it today. My amendment is in execution of the covenant of the platform.

Mr. President, I understand the significance of this procedure; I know its difficulties; I have examined into it closely. I know that is the least popular thing to do. I know that the easy thing to do is to appropriate Federal money with the prospect of avoiding local taxation whenever it can be done. That is much better than telling the people of my State, for instance, that they should levy more taxes.

Mr. President, I can go down the hill with anybody else, though I do not wish to do so. So I have stood here today and said what I thought; I have told the truth and stated the facts. I am glad I have made my record about it. We have got to straighten up the situation in America or face the inevitable consequences. Let us carry out the platform which the people elected us to do. If there is a mandate to Congress, that is the mandate. We promised them, and they accepted the promise.

Mr. President, I shall take my seat with one further remark. When I first proposed the amendment there was a good deal of discussion about the technical meaning of this or that phrase. I tried to explain that difficulty, but I am not concerned about that. If I have not used just the best words, and any other Senator has better words, I will be delighted to have him suggest them.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield in a moment. But I ask Senators in considering my amendment to inquire of themselves whether or not it is not proper and opportune that, in this simple, modest, and restrained way, we should make a gesture to the American people, to States, to cities, to counties, and political subdivisions by indicating that, having gone the limit of our capacity to help them when they were helpless, now that they are on their feet, we do not expect them to reach their hands into a strained Public Treasury until it has been found that they actually are in need of the money.

Mr. President, I shall yield, and then I desire to introduce some documents for the RECORD. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I want again to urge upon the Senator the view which I presented a few moments ago of the impracticability of making the amendment apply to projects already under way.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought I made that clear to the Senator. If he wishes to offer an amendment to that effect, I shall accept it.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator stated that he thought an examination could be made by Federal authorities in the next 10 days. Since that statement was made I have called the Administration and find there are 50,000 projects going on under local sponsorship today, and they do not even know the number of sponsors, but they believe there must be that many sponsors. It would be totally impossible to stop all this work as to projects which have already been put under way.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us settle that. I stated in answer to the Senator that I was unwilling to suggest that our Government should impair or think of impairing the obligation of its contracts. If the Senator will prepare an amendment, I shall be glad to adopt it.

Mr. BULKLEY. I would suggest striking out the words "paid or expended."

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no. I would suggest an amendment to my amendment to this effect:

Provided, however, That this proviso shall not relate to any projects now authorized.

I will insert that phraseology as a part of my amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think that will cover it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Even that proviso would work an unfair discrimination against any community which had not been able yet to get under the tent.

Mr. BAILEY. There is the point! [Laughter.] We have been doing this for 5 years. We are going to open the tent wide. That is the perfect argument that proves everything I have said. The whole Federal scheme will be a scheme which will be carried on until the crack of doom, until everybody gets under the tent. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. [Laughter.] I yield now to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who rose a moment ago.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I propound the inquiry to the Senator from North Carolina which was suggested to me by a condition in the State which I have the honor to represent in part.

Assume a condition where there are multiple numbers of things in the large State of Illinois and the large city of Chicago. The able Senator includes Illinois among the States he named. Assume, therefore, that there is a real need, that there is poverty and distress, that there is actual necessity for relief. The local community has really no money. It has reached the point where it cannot further tax. The legislature of the State assembles and refuses to adopt the suggestion of its Governor, for reasons to itself satisfactory, and refuses to levy taxes.

Under those circumstances, where there is no tax from the State, no relief from the State, where the necessities of relief are perfectly apparent and clear, what would the able Senator then say should be the sources of relief?

Mr. BAILEY. Why, Mr. President, my amendment provides that if the authority appointed by the President should find there is actual need they would get the money.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the Senator, in his excellent views in behalf of local government, declines to recognize the local government in its expression of what it needs by turning the subject over to the Federal Government, to the Executive power, his appointees and bureaus.

Mr. BAILEY. The amendment speaks for itself. It is possible that I spoke on broader lines than the terms of the amendment, but that was not intended to interpret the amendment. I was speaking generally on the whole question and providing a background for the argument that the time had come to put just a little brake on the program of National Federal expenditure by way of asking that any State or county or city or political subdivision which could carry on a project should have the decency to do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator alluded facetiously to my metaphor a moment ago in which I used the word "tent." What I had in mind and what I want to answer specifically is this. Does not the Senator know, as we all know, that there are thousands of applications on file with the W. P. A. and with the P. W. A. and all of the emergency agencies where there has been no negligence on the part of the local community in putting forward its application for a project? For lack of funds or for lack of time or for other reasons some of those projects have not been approved and have not been begun. I am speaking of local projects, sponsored by a county or city or district. Without any fault on the part of the local community, without any official passing upon the merits of those as compared with others, they have not been able to begin those projects. The unemployment and relief situation in those communities may be as meritorious in proportion as it was in those where the projects had been begun.

What I had in mind was the fact that the amendment suggested as one he would accept, following the colloquy between him and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], would put those already begun on a preferred status and bar those which had not been begun, so they would have to comply with all of this detailed certification and investigation, whereas those already begun would not have to meet that requirement. That is what I had in mind and that is what I meant when I referred to the "tent."

Mr. BAILEY. I understand what the Senator meant by everybody getting under the tent. He meant that all those should be allowed to get under the tent who had started.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; I am not attempting to say only those who had started. There may be others who are just as much ready to start as those who have already started.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not concerned about the tent. I can understand the metaphor all right. I am dealing with principles of government. Grant now that there are counties, cities, and towns that have projects. They have not brought them here and they have not been approved. If they are able to look after them, let them look after themselves. That is what I say. They should not argue that because somebody got some money last year they should have some next year. If we adopt such a principle, we will never get to the bottom of that barrel.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to his colleague?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is my understanding of the amendment suggested to my colleague by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] that this would not affect any projects which have been authorized, so as a result thereof I assume that would make answer to the inquiry directed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator is placing this whole question on a matter of principle, I suppose, of course, it is quite a concession that he is willing that the principle shall not be applied to the unfinished part of the projects which have already started, so the principle fades into insignificance.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no. I base that on the simple ground that even the best of principles cannot be invoked at once and applied as a rigid rule. We have gone into the business of relief. I would not think of trying to get out of it all at once. I would apply my principle considerately, reasonably, and with a view to the conditions with which we are dealing; but that does not mean that I compromise my principle.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to make an observation to the effect that my interpretation of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] would not only apply to the projects which have already been started, but that it would likewise embody every project that has been authorized and has not been started. Is that correct, may I ask the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I did not offer the amendment, but I think that is correct because there is always the question as to what constitutes starting, and it is not quite clear whether it has been authorized or not.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, I wish to take my seat.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I yield; but I am bound to sit down.

Mr. OVERTON. I desire some information from the Senator. I ask him what interpretation he places upon his amendment in a situation like the one I am about to state. Of course, the purpose of these appropriations is to relieve unemployment wherever it may exist. The purpose is to relieve distress. It is to provide work for the needy and the destitute.

Suppose that in the case of a community, say, a municipality, that is unable to finance a project, the municipality can readily furnish the certificate of necessity contemplated by the amendment of the Senator, and the best way to relieve unemployment in that community would not be through any locally sponsored project, but would be, we will say, through a State-owned project or a State-controlled project. In that event, am I to understand that if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted the State would have to furnish a certificate of necessity in order to relieve unemployment in that particular community?

To make my illustration more clear, what I have in mind is such a case as that of the Charity Hospital in New Orleans. Suppose New Orleans had no project whatsoever to relieve unemployment in that city which would be at all comparable to such a project as the Charity Hospital, to which I think was allotted some $8,000,000. The hospital is owned by the State of Louisiana. Under this amendment the State of Louisiana would have to furnish the certificate of necessity?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I think the State ought to furnish it just as readily as anybody else.

Mr. President, I offer for printing in the RECORD, first, a sheet with the title "W. P. A. Expenditures in 1936", showing expenditures of $16.11 per person in the United States, $28.38 per person in New York, and $4.83 per person in North Carolina. We get only one-fourth of the national average, and one-seventh of the amount New York gets.

Of the total amount expended in the United States, New York received 17.2 percent, and North Carolina eight-tenths of 1 percent.

On the basis of the population estimate of the United States as of 1936, 128,429,000, the population of New York is given as 12,935,000, and the population of North Carolina is given as 3,457,000. That is, we have one-fourth the population of New York, but while New York gets 17 percent of the whole we get only one-seventh as much money. They have three times the per-capita wealth that we have, and three times the annual per-capita income.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement referred to by the Senator from North Carolina will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

W. P. A. expenditures in 1936: $16.11 per person in the United States; $28.38 per person in New York; $4.83 per person in North Carolina.

Of total amount expended in United States New York received 0.172 or 17.2 percent; North Carolina received 0.008 or eight-tenths of 1 percent.

Based on population estimate as of 1936: United States 128,429,000; New York, 12,935,000; North Carolina, 3,457,000.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Does that statement include appropriations for public works?

Mr. BAILEY. This statement deals only with W. P. A. expenditures for last year.

Mr. WAGNER. It does not include relief money?

Mr. BAILEY. No; only W. P. A. expenditures.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator has not the figures on relief?

Mr. BAILEY. This statement relates only to the W. P. A. I have here a letter from Corrington Gill, the Assistant Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, which I am publishing for the purpose of corroborating my statement that the overhead expenditure of the W. P. A. was $99,000,000.

The truth is, it is $99,994,132. I publish it also to corroborate my statement about the expenditure for travel, $5,495,000, and the expenditure for communication, $2,238,975.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1937.

Senator J. W. BAILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BAILEY: This will acknowledge your letter to Mr. Hopkins of January 4, in which you request various types of information concerning the Works Progress Administration. The information requested is supplied herewith.

With reference to your question as to what basis is used for the allocation of W. P. A. funds to the respective States, Federal funds are allocated for State Works Progress Administration programs on the basis of the number of persons for whom employment must be provided and variations in labor and other cost from State to State. The number of persons to be employed is determined on the basis of relief and certification records, and additional information obtained by periodic surveys and reviews of the situation by regional and State officials of the W. P. A.

With reference to the amount of administrative expense, from the beginning of the W. P. A. program in the summer of 1935 through December 31, 1936, W. P. A. administrative expenditures totaled $99,994,132. This compares with a total expenditure for all purposes of $2,325,283,492. Administrative expenses thus have amounted to approximately 4.3 percent of the total W. P. A. expenditures. During the calendar year 1936 W. P. A. administrative expenditures averaged 3.6 percent.

With reference to the administrative expenses and monthly allotments which have been made to New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Alabama, Oklahoma, Virginia, and North Carolina, there is enclosed a table listing such expenses and allotments.

With reference to the salaries paid to the administrative staff in Washington and in the regional offices, there is enclosed a table giving this information.

With reference to the amount which has been expended for communication and travel, through November 30, 1936, the latest date for which this type of analysis is available, the United States Treasury reports that the W. P. A. had expended a total of $5,495,046.54 for travel and $2,328,975.51 for communication, out of a total of $93,868,835.93 of administrative expenditures. As of the same date total W. P. A. expenditures for all purposes amounted to $2,139,815,918.

Sincerely yours,

CORRINGTON GILL,
Assistant Administrator.

Mr. BAILEY. I also have a table of the expenditures out of funds allocated to the Works Progress Administration from the E. R. A. Acts of 1935 and 1936 in selected States: New York, $357,000,000; Pennsylvania, $221,000,000; Illinois, $140,000,000; Alabama, $20,000,000; Oklahoma, $38,000,000; Virginia, $15,900,000; North Carolina, $16,696,000. This table is offered just to support my statement that three States got 35 percent of the money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table referred to by the Senator from North Carolina will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the Senator be willing for me to inject at that point the statement that the three States mentioned by the Senator pay four-elevenths of the entire internal-revenue collections of the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; and when the Senator from Kentucky puts in that statement, let me say that the internal revenue paid by a State is no test on earth of State support of the Federal Government. That assertion could not come from any Senator better than from myself, because North Carolina sends to the Federal Government each year over $300,000,000. Very often I have been tempted to claim that as North Carolina's revenue to the Federal Government, but I know very well that it is not, and I know very well that the revenue collected by New York is not collected from the people of New York. It is collected from persons all over the country. The man who buys liquor, for example, is very apt to pay the internal-revenue tax to a Pennsylvania or a New York distiller. The man who buys tobacco or cigarettes is very likely to pay the internal-revenue tax to the North Carolina collector.

I think the tax bears down upon the tobacco farmers of my State. I think it is too high; but I do not think the State of North Carolina actually contributes $300,000,000 a year to the Federal Government, and nobody is ever going to hear me say that I do think so. I do not think the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky throws any light upon the question, but I am perfectly willing to have him make it for the RECORD. If he thinks North Carolina really pays $300,000,000 a year, then how can he explain the fact that we get back only eighteen or nineteen million dollars? Then the force of my argument is all the greater. In that case the other States are ruining North Carolina, and we are supporting the Union. But I am not contending that. I put North Carolina's tax on the per-capita basis. I said that if we had one-fortieth of the population, we should pay one-fortieth of the tax. I think that is a pretty fair way to do.

I will answer the Senator when I get through with these papers.

Here is a table giving the total expenditures of the Works Progress Administration for all purposes from funds allocated to the Works Progress Administration, by States, from January 1 through December 31, 1936, as per checks issued, as reported by the United States Treasury. That is the basis of a great deal of my argument, and I am going to ask Senators to check up and see what their States received, and then compare the amounts with those received by the other States. I ask to have this table printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

Mr. BAILEY. I have here a letter of January 19, 1937, from Mr. Emerson Ross, Director of the Division of Research, Statistics, and Records of the Works Progress Administration. I ask that the letter, with the tables accompanying it, be printed in the RECORD.

One table shows employment on Works program projects; and it shows that, notwithstanding the number has been reduced since last January by about 700,000, we are calling for just as much money as ever per month. The letter supports that statement.

Also attached to the letter is a statement showing employment on Works program projects in North Carolina. I am putting in that table for the information of North Carolina constituents.

I also have here a table showing the cumulative expenditures of the Works Progress Administration in the United States and North Carolina by months. I offer that table to show the accuracy of my statement that the $155,000,000 a month we are now calling for is pretty well in line with what we called for all of last year. I will make some distinctions. Last February the amount was $264,000,000; last July it was $163,000,000; last August it was $158,000,000. Now we contemplate running right through the remaining 5 months of this year at the rate of $155,000,000 a month.

I send these papers to the desk and ask to have them inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1937.

Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BAILEY: Your recent request on the activities of W. P. A. in the United States and in North Carolina last year has been referred to this division for reply.

You will please find enclosed herewith three tables which list the total amount of funds expended in the United States and in the State of North Carolina, by months during 1936, by the Works Progress Administration; employment by months on Works program projects for the United States; employment by months on Works program projects in North Carolina.

We are also enclosing copies of reports on the progress of the Works program dated October 15 and December 15 containing general information which may be of interest.

We trust that this information will satisfy your requirements.

Sincerely yours,

EMERSON ROSS,
Director, Division of Research, Statistics, and Records.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, has the Senator finished?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to ask him several questions.

First, I ask the Senator whether he has also studied the amount of need which existed in each State with reference to W. P. A. expenditures; for that, of course, is the final test as to the just distribution of funds.

Secondly, I ask whether the Senator has studied the record as to the direct relief paid by the Federal Government to the different States, and how it compares with the need requirements of the States.

Third, I ask the Senator whether he has studied the record as to how much money was appropriated to the States for public works during the same period?

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; I was dealing almost exclusively with the W. P. A.

Mr. WAGNER. The reason why I ask these questions is because last year I know we had a table from one of our colleagues on the other side which at the time I had not had a chance to examine, but upon examination I found it did not give a complete picture. It referred to the distribution of one type of funds, but did not tell us at all what money was spent for public works or what money was spent for direct relief; and if all three had been considered, the table would have presented an entirely different picture. Of course, the final test is not so much what a State pays by way of taxes but rather what is the unemployment situation in the particular State and how much is needed there to relieve that unemployment. That is true, because we are looking upon this as a national obligation, since it has gotten beyond the States; and that is the test we ought to apply in all these cases.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the Senator. I was making the point that it was secondarily a national obligation, primarily a State obligation. I also made the point that three American States were getting 35 percent of the relief money, that six were getting 50 percent. It is inconceivable to me that the unemployment problem is so related to the whole population that we could dispose of it to the extent of 35 percent by handling three States, or dispose of half of it by handling six.

The Senator asks me if I have studied the situation. I will answer plainly that I have not studied it beyond the current literature and information on the subject. I have no means of going into it; and that is just my argument. If the local responsibility may be put on the localities, it will be studied locally and in detail, but the man does not live who can study it as a whole. That is my point.

Mr. WAGNER. The point I tried to convey was that the records all exist in the different departments of the Federal Government, that these were matters of report, and the facts can be easily ascertained. I was wondering whether an examination had been made so as to determine what contributions were made to the States for relief, for instance. I do not know what the facts are. I suppose that New York gave a very much larger percentage of direct relief to its citizens, and therefore exacted less from the Federal Government, and received a larger sum for W. P. A. One may balance the other.

I do believe that the moneys have been honestly handled and have been fairly distributed, and if there is a disparity it is because the need existed more in one community than in another. I think that if we could have specific cases of absolute squandering of money in one community as against another when the need did not really exist we would have something upon which a complaint could be based.

I say this in justice not to my State alone, but in justice to all of the States, because in my activities during my membership in the Senate I have never uttered a provincial word, I believe, and always have had the Nation as a whole in mind in whatever humble contribution I have made in the way of relieving the distress of the unfortunate.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad, Mr. President, to bear witness to the truth of the statement the Senator has made. Perhaps I have at times uttered provincial words.

Mr. WAGNER. I did not say the Senator had.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the Senator would be incapable of suggesting that I had. I will make my own confession. Perhaps I have. I would not be ashamed to speak for the right of my State. If that is provincial, then I am guilty. I would not be ashamed to speak of the obligation and the duty of my State; if that is provincial, I am guilty. I owe my election to the people of North Carolina. I owe my duty to my country. But in the discharge of that duty it becomes me to consider the interests and the point of view of the sovereign commonwealth which sent me here. I would not say that that was provincial. That may disclose a difference in conception. But I am a Senator of the United States from the State of North Carolina. I came from the people of North Carolina. To them I shall return, and to them I am accountable. They ask me to see the national scene and serve the national interest. But they also require me, in the execution of that national interest, to see that they are fairly treated, and that is my dearest duty.

Mr. President, I have here a letter from Mr. Ernest G. Draper, of the Bureau of Economic Research, containing statements as to relative income, and also a statement as to the assessed valuation of taxable property and volume of business for specific industries in New York State and New York City. I shall ask to have that printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, with this I am done. I should like to say, since the Senator from New York did not hear me, that the W. P. A. system requires the sponsors of the projects in New York State to put up 6 percent, and it requires the sponsors of projects in North Carolina to put up 20 percent. It allows a wage in New York City of $65 a month, and it allows a wage in North Carolina of $27 a month.

I cannot consent that that is just or that it is fair; but I am not complaining of the Senator, and I am not complaining of New York. I am complaining of the system.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I am sorry I have not had the opportunity of hearing all of the able speech of the Senator from North Carolina. I should like to inquire whether he is of the opinion that the Federal Government should abandon its efforts to administer relief in the several States?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no, Mr. President; I have never entertained such a thought or intimated such a thing.

Mr. WALSH. I have not finished my question.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well; I would like to stop it on the threshold.

Mr. WALSH. And would the Senator want the Federal Government to confine itself to appropriating and paying certain sums of money with the understanding that the States would contribute a certain percentage of the total cost and that all the administration should be handled by the several States?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, at the outset of my speech I referred to the fact that the Democratic House of Representatives, and the Democrats at the time in control of the Senate, as I recall, notwithstanding they did not have an actual majority, in the summer of 1932 did set up the plan of Federal contributions and loans to the States. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] says to me aside that that was through one of his bills, and I am glad to have that in the RECORD.

I merely desire to say on that point that I am not asking for any sudden shutting off of relief. I know we could not do that. I think I would fight as hard a battle as would any Senator to prevent a thing like that happening. I know there are millions of people now dependent on what we do. I am going to vote for the pending bill; I shall vote for it without my amendment. The bill is a public necessity. I am undertaking here to put into the bill the principle of action which I think will tend to set us right and restore us to a sound policy. That is my whole argument. I welcome an opportunity to make it perfectly plain that that is what I have in mind.

I ask that the tables and letters which I have sent to the desk be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, January 22, 1937.

Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your letter of January 13, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has compiled the available data in answer to your questions concerning the tax valuation of real and personal property, the volume of business, per-capita income and per-capita wealth in New York city and New York State, and the per-capita income and wealth in North Carolina. Recent official data are not available with respect to all of these matters; in fact, such reliable data compiled by unofficial sources cannot be found in all cases. While the private data which we are sending are the best that are available, by their nature they cannot be accurate and, in fact, we put no great confidence in most of those relating to wealth and income.

You will note that there has been no estimate of national wealth by the Bureau of the Census since 1922, due to curtailment of appropriations for that purpose. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has recently published estimates of the national income for 1929 to 1935, inclusive, and while these have been shown separately by industries, and also by economic classes, it has not been possible to date to show geographical or individual distribution of such income. A copy of this report on national income is being sent under separate cover.

The Division of Economic Research, of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, is beginning studies to determine the geographical distribution of income, but this will require some time. It has plans also for making an estimate of the national wealth, but this investigation has been held in abeyance on account of lack of funds. It is hoped, however, that Congress will provide additional funds to carry forward the income, wealth, and other studies during the present session. The Bureau of the Budget has approved part of our request for such purposes.

If we can be of further service to you at any time, please feel free to call upon us.

Yours sincerely,

ERNEST G. DRAPER,
Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, very briefly I desire to present my compliments to the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and to congratulate him upon the courage and the candor and the irresistible conclusions which are inherent in his address this afternoon. While the amendment which he has offered, to my way of thinking, is probably ill-timed, because we are in midseason in respect to our relief program, and therefore we are not essentially free agents in respect to the choice of a system, yet it is wise to face the challenge in prospect. To me the challenge of his speech is a challenge to us that the system soon must be changed. That challenge, rather than finding an expression, in an effort to amend this particular appropriation measure, finds its expression in a challenge not only to the President in respect to his relief recommendations a few months hence, but equally to the Congress in respect to the responsibility of the legislature itself. It is a challenge to develop an alternative relief system which shall do justice to legitimate relief needs while also preserving the public credit.

I think it is perfectly obvious that the existing system leads straight to tragedy, and ultimately to ruin, and it seems to me that the responsibility upon the Congress to start now its study and consideration of an alternative improved plan is perfectly obvious.

Mr. President, nothing I have to say relates in any degree to emergency, life, and death necessities of relief, which, of course, Congress must meet regardless of the consideration of cost. The observation I make relates to the basic and semipermanent form of relief upon which the Government is embarked.

The able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made a moving speech yesterday in describing the plight of the agriculturalist who is in need of relief as an emergency matter. The able Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] described the emergency need of those who find themselves, because of last year's vicissitudes, stranded in his part of the Nation. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] made an impressive address respecting the emergency needs of those in the flooded areas.

Mr. President, the greater these emergency needs and the more clearly the responsibility upon us to accept and meet these emergency needs, by the same token the greater the responsibility is upon us to clear away any unnecessary expenditures so that there can be a public credit upon which the victims of disaster can dependably rely.

Who has the greatest interest in America in the preservation of the public credit? It is not the financier, it is not the man of means. They may meet unexpected situations without help from anyone. But those who are dependent on the Government alone for something to eat and something to wear and a roof over their heads, those for whom only the public credit stands against the hour of distress, have the greatest stake of all in the preservation of the public credit. So when one pleads for the preservation of the public credit, he is not pleading property advantage or special privilege; he is pleading for the maintenance of a system under which America can continue to meet its legitimate and essential emergency requirements.

Is that going to be possible much longer, Mr. President, under the existing system? I submit that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has made it perfectly plain that it cannot continue. I submit that our common knowledge sustains him. I shall not duplicate his calculations, but I shall present one brief calculation of my own bearing to the same net result.

Mr. President, the annual total relief and recovery appropriation for 1937, including the amount we are asked to appropriate today, is only $800,000,000 less than the total appropriation in 1934 when it reached its peak of nearly $4,000,000,000. As the Senator from North Carolina has said, the American status, the index of American life, has immeasurably improved, thank Heaven, since 1934. In many of our cities employment is practically back to normal. Is relief back to normal? I should say not. Despite all the recovery that has occurred, despite all the reemployment that has been brought about—and we are all happy to acknowledge that the employment index today is substantially greater than it has been for 6 years—the regular relief appropriation, excluding what is to be spent for flood sufferers and the like, is only $800,000,000 smaller than the peak. That can only mean that our relief expenditures are being standardized at a dangerous level.

Mr. President, if the relief expenditure for this fiscal year is still well over $3,000,000,000, and is only $800,000,000 below the peak, in spite of the vast reemployment that has occurred, how is it humanly possible under the system we are following for the President to reach his contemplated purpose of spending only one and a half billion dollars for relief next year? It is perfectly obvious that he cannot do so. It is perfectly obvious that except as the system changes—if it can change—the President cannot hope to bring his relief expenditures within one and a half billion dollars next year, as he hopes and contemplates. Therefore, he cannot balance the Federal Budget.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I think the Senator from Michigan is one of the most brilliant and able critics of the administration. The Senator has a fine mind. I have listened for a long time to his criticism of relief expenditures. I have frequently found myself wondering why the Senator and his Republican brethren, in indicting the operations of the Relief Administration, do not now propose or have not proposed over the years some standard by which relief shall be given to the individual because, after all, it is the sum total of individual payments that makes up the large sum which the Senator criticizes. If the Republican Party now, through one of its ablest spokesmen, is to indict the whole system of relief in this country, it seems to me certainly there is enough intelligence in the Republican Party to formulate some standard by which the payment of relief funds to individuals may be gaged.

Perhaps I am not treating the Senator fairly and am making some unfair suggestions, but I am wondering if the Republican Party has the nerve to do that. It is one thing to be a critic, but it is another thing to make a constructive suggestion as to how relief money shall go to the little fellows. Now, I know the Senator——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator from Washington about finished his question, or is he now proceeding to ask another one?

Mr. BONE. I admit that I am transgressing the rules, but if the Senator will be patient——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not very patient with the injection of politics into this debate, because I had not the remotest thought of any such thing.

Mr. BONE. Ah, but this is not politics. The Senator is indicting a system without offering anything in exchange for it except to criticize.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cannot possibly offer anything in exchange unless the Senator will let me have the floor long enough to do so.

Mr. BONE. If the Senator will do that, I shall be very happy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, as I was saying when I was interrupted by my able friend from Washington—whom I thank for his compliment, at least [laughter]—I do not believe it is possible for the existing system to continue and to bring the relief expenditure next year within gunshot of the President's estimate. I rose primarily to applaud the President's purpose. In spite of the observations to the contrary of the other side, and some rather invidious smiles in addition to the comment, I rose to applaud the President's purpose, as reported in the New York Herald Tribune this morning, to put this whole system under immediate examination and scrutiny. For what purpose? To make three major decisions:

The first: To determine what parts of the unemployed population should be accepted as a Federal responsibility. The second question: What kind of relief should be given? The third question: How should cost be distributed among the Federal, State, and local governments?

I rose to say that when the Executive addresses himself to those questions he is addressing himself to the fundamentals that are wrapped up in this problem, and that Congress itself ought to address itself to those problems and quit shadow-boxing with a potentially menacing system.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has undertaken to address himself to those problems this afternoon, and I have undertaken merely to say that I think he has approached them through the right avenue.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] wants to know why no alternative is proposed. An alternative was proposed 1 year ago by way of restoration of State responsibility and State decision. That alternative was rejected. I introduced the bill, and those who ask me to be specific in my recommendations are answered by that bill. I have no doubt in the world that before we are through with the relief problem we shall unitedly agree that there is no escape from the unfortunate and the unhappy phases of the relief problem except to restore home rule and home responsibility and home decision and home obligations, and the policing of relief through the power of home neighborhood opinion. I think sooner or later we are going unitedly to find it inescapable that we arrive at that goal, plus, of course, Federal grants-in-aid on whatever basis common judgment agrees the necessity requires.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas rises to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. The Senator keeps stressing local responsibility and local administration. Does the Senator favor remitting the whole problem to the local authorities?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, indeed. My general theory, Mr. President, is that there should be an unemployment census which would produce real, definite, yardstick information respecting the necessities up and down this country; that on the basis of that sort of authentic disclosure the Federal grants-in-aid should be made to the States on a subsistence basis equal to the necessity as disclosed by the census, leaving it then to the States to administer on whatever basis they may deem wise, and giving them the responsibility for doing so, and to require their own funds to meet any additional burdens which State and local decisions may approve.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator, then, would favor the Federal Government turning this money over to the States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. And let them administer it in any way they desire?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. What becomes of our responsibility, then, as Federal officers in not having some control of the way in which the money should be spent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator means no control to the extent that no criteria are set up in the legislation, of course that is not what I meant. I would provide the criteria. But I mean that the primary responsibility for decision and the primary responsibility for administration must be localized, because it just cannot continue to be centralized. Perhaps there are many arguments against localizing; but my feeling is that there are so many more arguments against centralizing it that the balance inevitably ultimately falls in favor of localized responsibility.

Mr. CONNALLY. Localized responsibility is all right so long as the localized responsibility is spending local money, but when it comes to turning over Federal money to a local authority, money which the local community itself does not raise, the strands of responsibility become very tenuous and somewhat worn.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Except as it is done in cooperation. I entirely agree with the Senator, and I said I intended that there should be cooperation.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator makes a moving speech about local responsibility and local contribution, and then comes along and destroys it all by saying that it should be done with Federal aid and with Federal money. If the Federal Government is going to spend the money, the Federal Government must retain some degree of control over the funds, because anyone can spend other people's money.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Federal Government were to measure the subsistence minimum necessary to keep people in this country from starving, and from going unclothed, and from going unsheltered, and then were to distribute such sum of money to the various States on the basis of unemployment census revelations, having thus discharged its responsibility to see that there is no basic want or distress in this country, I submit that when a State received its share of the distribution, that distribution would be under an intimate home discipline of public opinion which is the most fruitful sort of discipline by way of obtaining advisable and essential and legitimate net results.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the Senator to say that he now favors local responsibility and Federal grants-in-aid.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask if this is the language in which he favors it:

> 1. The return of responsibility for relief administration to nonpolitical local agencies familiar with community problems.
> 2. Federal grants-in-aid to the States and Territories while the need exists upon compliance with these conditions: (a) A fair proportion of the total relief burden to be provided from the revenues of State and local governments; (b) all engaged in relief administration to be selected on the basis of merit and fitness.

May I ask if that is not what the Senator favored during the campaign last year, and if that is not the platform of the Republican Party, a platform promulgated in an election in which the Republican Party received the electoral votes of only two States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It may have been the platform, but if it is, I have not the slightest interest in the world in it at the moment. I am trying to lay before the Senate simply the contemplation that we do probably confront a problem; I do not know what the answer is in detail. I think I do know the general principle which must be pursued.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not at the moment; I will yield later. I do not know the answer in detail. I have not risen pretending to know the answer in detail. I have risen to say that I recognize a problem when I see it, and that the problem is at the bar of the Senate and the House as well as knocking at the White House door, and that when the President of the United States is prepared to concede that it is necessary to inquire into the whole situation, as he has, I think, the Congress should equally arm itself with an inquiry to determine what is the best answer by way of detail.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield?
